PREFACE

THIS collection comprises all the documents at present known to exist relative to the history of Crosraguel Abbey. The Chartulary or Register of the Monastery, which was quoted by several writers of last century, and was actually in the possession of the Earl of Cassillis in 1729, has been irretrievably lost ; and when I commenced some years ago to collect and edit these Charters, the only materials at hand were a few worthless legends, to be sternly discarded by the historian. The present collection will, it is hoped, be found to contain much that is entirely new to our local history, and to give a tolerably complete narrative of the fortunes of the Abbey, with many glimpses at its interior economy, for a period of over 350 years. There are many gaps in the sequence of events, notably during the latter part of the fourteenth, and earlier part of the fifteenth centuries. Yet those were the dark ages in our national history, and few monasteries can boast of many memorials of that stormy period, save sacrilege, plunder, and oppression. The cream of the collection is undoubtedly the series of muniments from the charter chest of the Marquess of Ailsa at Culzean, to whose courtesy in allowing the documents to be printed the Association is much indebted. Looking to the fact that the private collections throughout the country constitute an almost unexplored mine of historical wealth, we cannot too highly commend Lord Ailsa's public-spirited example.

The Charters themselves are printed, as usual, without the old contractions, which only serve to puzzle and fail to instruct. I have endeavoured to weave them into a continuous narrative in the Introduction, which, with the Explanatory Notes, will enable the reader, it is hoped, to follow with ease and interest the fortunes of an opulent Ayrshire Abbey from its foundation to its fall.

Engravings are given of many of the most important among the charters, seals, and royal autographs; and the reproduction of several old prints of the Abbey will be found to be of interest.

In conclusion, I must express my thanks to those who have at all times given me generous assistance in the work, which has been essentially a labour of love; especially to Mr. Cochran-Patrick; to the Rev. J. Cameron Lees, D.D., St. Giles, Edinburgh; to Mr. Joseph Bain, London; to Lord Talbot of Malahide; to M. Bruel, Archéviste Publique, Paris; to Mr. Thomas Dickson, of the Register House; to the Rev. Walter Macleod; to Mr. Vans Agnew of Barnbarroch; to the Rev. J. F. S. Gordon, D.D.; to the Keepers of the various Public Libraries; and to many others. A special meed of praise is due to Mr. James Morris, F.S.A. Scot., for the care and skill which he has displayed in executing the drawings of the existing ruins of the Abbey buildings, and for his valuable remarks on their architectural history.

F. C. HUNTER BLAIR.

INTRODUCTION

I. THE HISTORY OF THE ABBEY.

THE Abbey of S. Mary of Crosraguel has not hitherto been widely known in Scottish history for two reasons ; (1) the loss of the Chartulary and the consequently scattered condition of the Charters and other documents, which have been collected from many different sources, and are now printed together for the first time ; (2) the fact that its Abbots did not, with few exceptions, play as important a part in public affairs as the heads of other monastic establishments. Yet they were men held in high honour in their own country. Many of them, as we shall find, sat in the various Parliaments of three hundred years ; some of their number were from time to time members of the Privy Council, Commissioners of State, Royal Ambassadors, and high legal functionaries ; and under their rule the Abbey was a centre of light to the surrounding districts. The monks of Crosraguel were the agriculturists and the schoolmasters of the time. Constant instances occur in these papers of the care which they devoted to farming, to the working of the coal-heughes, to the cultivation of woods, orchards, gardens ; to the development of the fine arts, such as music and architecture ; to philosophy, science, theology, and other literary pursuits. Without doubt they did much to keep alive in the hearts of the country people a knowledge of right and wrong in very stormy times.

We shall find two leading features in tracing the history of Crosraguel from its foundation ; first, a continuous endeavour on the part of Paisley Abbey to retain its superiority over its dependent house ; secondly, a lasting connection between the Abbey itself and the great House of Kennedy, whose dominant influence was humorously expressed in the old saw :—

“From Wigton to the town of Ayr, Port Patrick and the cruives of Cree ;
Man need not think for to byde there,
Unless he court with Kennedie.”

The Kennedies were maternally descended from the old Earl of Carrick who founded the Abbey, and two of the family were Abbots themselves.

§ 1. The Foundation of the Abbey.—1200-1268.

The golden age of Scottish ecclesiastical architecture, inaugurated by David the First, the “sair sanct for the Crown,” continued long after that monarch’s death, and until the country was deluged with the Wars of Independence. King David’s barons and their successors emulated their sovereign’s example in founding churches and monasteries throughout the land. And thus we find that at the close of the twelfth century one Duncan, Earl of Carrick, to whom the whole country of Carrick had been apportioned by William the Lion, granted some of his lands there to the Abbey of Paisley, under certain conditions ;¹ namely, that the monks of Paisley should found a monastery in Carrick after their own Order of Cluny, and that these possessions should at once be handed over to the new community. On the same terms Earl Duncan granted to Paisley the patronage of the churches of Straiton, Dailly, and S. Oswald of Turnberry ;² and entrusted to its care the books, vestments, and other articles necessary for the use and adornment of the future monastery.³

The monks of Paisley evaded the conditions of this munificent grant. The Church of Turnberry was confirmed to them by Florence, the Bishop-elect of Glasgow, in 1202 ;⁴ twenty-three years later, Honorius III. confirmed to their use the lands of Crosraguel and Southblane ;⁵ and in 1236 they received a confirmatory grant of the churches of Turnberry, Straiton, and Dalmakeran, from Alexander the Second.⁶ Meanwhile they built at Crosraguel a cell or oratory, where they had service performed by some of their own community for many years, enjoying all the while the wealthy emoluments of the Carrick lands.⁷

In 1244 the Earl appears to have suddenly awoke to the manner in which his munificent endowments were being misapplied. He accordingly complained to the Abbey of Paisley. William de Bondington, Bishop of Glasgow, was appointed arbiter in the matter ; and the “Scriptum de Corsragmol”⁸ records his decision. The Paisley monks were forthwith to erect a monastery at Crostraguel, to be governed by an Abbot, who should be elected by the monks, and be free from the jurisdiction of the Abbot of Paisley. With one exception—that the Abbot of Paisley should visit the younger house once a year with a moderate retinue, and should correct any irregularities which he found therein. Further, the lands held in Carrick were to be ceded for ever to the house of Crostraguel for the yearly payment of ten marks of silver.

Such was in effect the Charter of foundation; and Earl Duncan himself superintended the erection of the church and the surrounding buildings.¹ He died in 1250, and other hands completed the work. He was a great benefactor to the Church. He had granted his lands of Maybottle to the monks of Melrose, and the parish church of Maybole to the Cistercian Nunnery of North Berwick.²

Duncan was succeeded in the earldom by his son Nigel, who figures in history as a leader of the English party, and as a Regent of the kingdom after the Roxburgh Convention in 1255. Like his father he was a generous patron to Crostraguel, and granted to the monastery various lands from his earldom of Carrick.³

Before long, the old disputes as to the conflicting rights of Paisley and Crostraguel to the Carrick lands broke out afresh. The Paisley monks were dissatisfied with the decision of the Bishop of Glasgow, and in 1265 they appealed to the Papal Court for a restitution of their former privileges.⁴ Clement the Fourth issued a Papal commission, consisting of three churchmen of high rank, to summon witnesses for the hearing of the case, and to terminate it by judgment within the year. From the charters which follow this appeal¹ it is clear that the commission decided in confirmation of the Scriptum of 1244. True that in later years Crosraguel and Southblane were enumerated among the possessions of Paisley in Papal bulls,² but they were confirmed in many subsequent charters to Crosraguel.³ The Abbey had thus obtained a firm hold over its property, and was at length in a position of prosperity and power.

§ 2. The Abbey under the Bruces.—1268-1370.

Crosraguel is for the next hundred years inseparably associated with the fortunes of the family of Bruce. The origin of their settlement in Carrick is well known. In 1268 a young knight, Robert de Brus, son of the Lord of Annandale, was riding through the domains of Marjory Countess of Carrick, the daughter of Earl Nigel. There he encountered the fair owner of the Castle of Turnberry, and was led off by her to the castle. They were married within a month, and the issue of their romantic love was the great King Robert.⁴ The Countess Marjory had herself been a great benefactress to Crosraguel;⁵ and we find that Robert de Brus, who acquired the earldom in right of his wife, followed her pious example in making grants of land to the Abbey.⁶ The Castle of Turnberry was now literally a tower of defence to the monks in these troublous times.

In the year 1275, the Pope sent an Emissary named Boiamund da Vicci into Scotland to collect the tenth of all ecclesiastical benefices to defray the cost of the great Crusade to the Holy Land.¹ The tax was sternly enforced, according to the "True Value" of the livings, though the clergy strove hard to have it raised on the "antiqua taxatio." They resisted it tooth and nail, among them doubtless the Abbot of Crosraguel, who had to contribute £53:6:8;² other churches in Carrick, dependent upon the Abbey, being also taxed. The total amount collected was £7195.

After the calamitous death of Alexander the Third and the accession of the Maiden of Norway in 1286, a powerful party of barons was formed against the young Queen. They met at the Castle of Turnberry in September, when one Patrick was Abbot of Crosraguel,³ and drew up the famous covenant for mutual protection. Abbot Patrick was on intimate terms with these malcontent nobles. He witnessed a charter⁴ by one of the signatories to the covenant, Alexander Lord of the Isles; among the other witnesses being Robert Bruce and his son, the future King Robert the First. Patrick is the first abbot of whom any record is preserved. We do not find his name among those present at the meeting of the Scottish Estates at Brigham in 1290, when the celebrated treaty was concluded confirming to the people their ancient rights. Still more important is it to relate that no Abbot of Croraguel figured at the Parliament of Berwick in 1296, when multitudes of Scotchmen of every rank, whose names fill thirty-five skins of parchment, flocked at the peril of their lives to swear fealty to Edward.

During the next ten years, memorable for the heroic efforts of Wallace to free his countrymen from the English yoke, and culminating in his execution and the subsequent coronation of Robert Bruce, little is known of Croraguel. A new figure has appeared upon the scene. Henry de Percy, nephew of Surrey, and one of Edward's bravest generals, was appointed Keeper of Galloway and the Sherifdom of Ayr in 1296. The country was now dominated by the English party, and in 1306 Percy was again despatched into Carrick. He held the Castle of Turnberry all that year. On St. James' Day we find him writing from the very Abbey of Croraguel¹ to Sir James Dalileghe for two engines of war; and it is marvellous how Croraguel escaped the fate of Dunfermline, Paisley, St. Andrews, Kelso, and countless other monasteries, at the sacrilegious hands of the English soldiery. The gifts to the Abbey in 1329 from the royal purse² prove that the old buildings of Earl Duncan had not remained intact. But the tide soon turned. The Bruce landed at Turnberry with a few faithful followers. The men of Carrick rose in a solid mass and fought in his favour. Percy evacuated the royal castle; and a series of hardly-fought successes, culminating in the decisive field of Bannockburn, put an end to all hopes on the part of England of accomplishing the conquest of her sister country.

Yet in these stirring times the Earls of Carrick did not forget their Abbey. In 1306 King Robert conferred the earldom on his brother, the gallant Edward, whose gifts to Crosraguel of Dalchorane, Corale, and Hackethinvach we find duly confirmed by royal charter in 1324.¹ The King was himself lavish in his benefactions to the Abbey. In spite of the thunderings of the Court of Rome, the Scottish clergy knew him to be their friend, and never deserted him. And in the last five years of his eventful life, when peace was partially restored, we find him bestowing many lands upon the Church. We have three Crown Charters to Crosraguel in his reign. By the first, which is dated 1324,² he granted to the Abbey the lands of Dungrelach, where in a later day the monks built a mill, which was a source of great profit. By the second of the same date³ he erected all the Abbey lands into a free barony, implying not only the highest and most privileged tenure of land, but a vast jurisdiction over the inhabitants. The concomitant privileges of the barony included the sac et soc, the right of judging in litigious suits; tholl et teme, the exaction of toll and the bonds of mutual warranty; furca et fossa, the "gallows and pit," or the right of capital punishment in certain cases; infangthef et outfangthef, the right to punish a thief when caught with the "fang," either within or without the Abbey's jurisdiction. These pertinents of the barony belonged de jure to the Crown, and the grant of them was a mark of special favour. By the third Crown Charter, dated 1327,¹ the King confirmed to the Abbey the lands granted by the previous Earls of Carrick.

A few months after David the Second had commenced his ill-starred reign, the Abbot of Croraguel received the King's Penny for three years for the repair of his monastery, amounting to £100 : 1 : 10.² The Parliament of the previous year had ratified the taxation of the country for the payment of the indemnity of £20,000 to England. This was termed the Contribucio pro pace, and was to be levied according to the tenth penny of the rents for three successive years. Sir Malcolm Fleming, the bailie for Carrick, collected over £430, from which the sum above mentioned was returned to the Abbot of Croraguel.

We know little of the Abbey for the next thirty years amid the turmoil of the English wars. About 1360 we have the Abbey seal attached to the charter of Marjory Montgomery³—ten years before the death of the last of the royal Bruces.

§ 3. The Abbey under the first Stewarts.—1370-1460.

The Charters of this period relate chiefly to the domestic history of the monastery. The Abbots of Paisley had never relaxed one iota from their control over Croraguel, as laid down in the old decree of Bishop William, and we have in 1370 an interesting episode arising from the connection.⁴ The then Abbot of Paisley paid frequent visits to his dependent house, and to his sorrow, we are told, found many "faults and defects" among the community. These appear to have arisen from the inability of their aged Abbot, Roger of Dunfermline, to regulate their conduct. The notarial instrument prosaically narrates how the Superior of Paisley summoned the Crosraguel fraternity to appear before him on a certain Wednesday; how the monks appeared in their own monastery with their venerable Abbot; how that worthy old man, after the reading of the citatorial letter, resigned into the hands of the Abbot of Paisley the whole dignity of the Abbot of Crosraguel; and being pressed for his reason, he replied that, "owing to age and weakness he was unable to rule the flock committed to him by God as behoved the office of a good shepherd; and that he desired rather to be entirely stripped of the honour of the prelacy, than under the name of a pastor to allow his flock to be devastated by the ravening wolf." The whole story is a pathetic one, and reminds one strangely of the tale of Abbot Boniface in The Monastery. On the resignation of Abbot Roger, who returned to his former home at Dunfermline, Nicolas, one of the monks, and possibly the prototype of the Father Eustace of Walter Scott, was elected in his place.¹

Nicolas was undeniably an able and energetic man. During the visit of Robert the Second to Carrick in 1374 the Abbot prevailed upon the King to ratify, at the parish church of Kirkoswald, the three Crown Charters of Robert the

First.¹ In the lawless districts of Carrick these charters of confirmation must have been literally worth their weight in gold to the monks. It is not clear how long Abbot Nicolas ruled at Crosraguel. He witnesses several charters of the period, notably a most interesting deed by John Kennedy of Dunure to the Chapel of S. Mary of Maybole²—remarkable for the fines to be levied upon the presbyters for non-attendance at mass—and another charter (not in this collection) by Roland Kennedy of Blairquhan in 1390.³

We might almost hope that Nicolas lived to see the great Crosraguel Charter of 1404, signed by Robert the Third.⁴ This was the climax of all preceding grants, the Charter in liberam regalitatem seu regaliā, the confirmation of all the Abbey lands and other property to be for ever in a free regality. Among them we find the churches of Kirkoswald, Straiton, Dailly, Girvan, and Kirkcudbright or Ballantrae; the chapels of Kirkdamdie and Chapel Donnan; the various lands granted by previous benefactors, and the island of Ailsa Craig. The Abbot of Crosraguel was created absolute sovereign over his whole territory. The grant of regality gave to him all that the Crown had to give, even to the quatuor puncta corone,—the jurisdiction in cases of murder, fire-raising, rape, and robbery. Not even the mother house of Paisley enjoyed this last privilege; and the conferring of so high an honour upon Crosraguel was a living proof of the interest which the royal descendants of the old Earls of Carrick took in the welfare of the Abbey.

In the year 1405 the Abbey of Cluny sent a deputation to visit all the houses of the Order in England and Scotland. The deputation appears to have visited Crosraguel, and to have mentioned in its report,¹ preserved in the National Archives at Paris, that ten was the regular number of the inmates of the monastery.

We cannot doubt that the monks enjoyed peace and prosperity during the brilliant reign of James the First. The Abbot at this period was a man in high favour at Court, for we find him despatched as Special Ambassador to Ireland in 1429, to bring back from the Prince of Connaught the head of the rebel Donald Balloch.² And we have the Conventual seals appended at Crosraguel to a remarkable charter which was drawn up there in 1415.³ These are glimpses, in an obscure period of history, of the high position which the Abbey continued to occupy.

§ 4. The Abbacies of Colin, David, and Robert.—1460-1520.

In the year 1460 one Colin was elected Abbot of Crosraguel. He was an important figure in its history. His first care was to restore the buildings of his Abbey, which had been shattered by the violence of the English; and Father Hay (quoting apparently from the lost Chartulary) describes him as spending whole days in superintending the work of restoration.⁴ Abbot Colin's work was doubtless a great one. To him we probably owe the richly designed chapter-house and other monastic buildings of the same period ; and the restoration of the greater part of the church. His taste for architecture found him favour with that patron of the fine arts King James the Third, and he was a constant attendant at the various Parliaments of that monarch's reign. Twice in 1478,¹ when the subsidy of 20,000 marks was granted to the King ; three times in 1481,² when energetic measures were adopted in view of a war with England ; in December 1482,³ when the supreme power was usurped by Albany as Lieutenant-General of the kingdom ; and twice in 1485.⁴ So far back as 1465 he was appointed arbiter, with Lord Cathcart and others, in the event of any disputes regarding certain dowries of the Kennedy family ;⁵ and in 1477 he witnessed an Act of the Great Seal.⁶ He obtained many special privileges for his monastery. Among others an important renunciation of any right of episcopal visitation within the monastic precincts.⁷ In his time, too, occur the first series of writs relating to the Fergussons of Knockgarron⁸—full of interest for the information they afford us on the solemn methods of transfer of land from father to son in early times, by resignation and subsequent infeftment through bailies specially appointed for the purpose by the lord of the regality.

In the last year of Abbot Colin's life a charter was signed by the Abbot and five of the monks to one of these Fergussons,⁹ and the first mention is made of the Chapter House.¹⁰ He died in 1491,¹ and Robert de Quintfort or Whytefoord, a brother of Whytefoord of that Ilk,² and previously cellarer in the monastery of Paisley,³ was elected to the vacant Abbacy. He took no part in public affairs, and his rule at Corsraguel was brief and colourless. Yet he watched over the interests of his Abbey with a jealous eye, and when the Laird of Bargany in 1493 usurped a portion of the decimæ garbales of the regality—the most precious privilege that a monastery enjoyed—Abbot Robert summoned him before the Lords Auditors of Causes and Complaints in Edinburgh.⁴

He was succeeded by David, perhaps the David Chalmer mentioned in a charter of 1492⁵ as being one of the Community. He witnessed an Act of Privy Seal in 1498.⁶ In his time the Fraternity were much disquieted by the appearance of one John Hamilton, who pitched his sacrilegious tent at the very gate of the Abbey, occupying four dwelling-houses, a smithy, an orchard, and a yard. And as Hamilton stoutly refused to give up his occupancy, the Abbot obtained a decree from the Lords of Council ordaining this troublesome neighbour to quit before term day.⁷ But Abbot David did more for Corsraguel than this. From the Archbishop of Glasgow he obtained a confirmation of all the spiritual rights of the Abbey.⁸ And in 1515, when the Archbishop of St. Andrews was delegated by the Pope to visit every monastery in Scotland, and to punish the “excesses and enormities of the brethren dwelling “ therein,” the Abbot of Crosraguel obtained a special dispensation from any inspection of so equivocal a nature.¹ The fact that the Archbishop bound himself by oath never to visit or reform the monastery of Crosraguel speaks volumes for the excellent discipline which had been maintained under the rule of its late abbots, in an age when the luxury and indolence of the clergy had passed into a byword.

§ 5. The Abbey under William Kennedy.—1520-1547.

During the forty years preceding the Reformation, the monks of Crosraguel enjoyed the immediate protection of the Earls of Cassillis; and two eminent members of this family were abbots during the period. In 1520, William, brother to the second earl, was elected to the vacant office.² Jealous of their ancient rights, the Abbot and Convent of Paisley protested in vain against the election, which they refused to confirm as vicars of the mother house of Cluny.³ William was duly elected, and retained the Abbacy until his death in 1547. We may notice here how the abbots were appointed at Crosraguel. By their ancient Charter of foundation the monks had full power given to them to elect their own abbots.⁴ We have instances of this in 1370, when Nicolas succeeded Abbot Roger,⁵ and again in 1491;⁶ though in the latter case the election was confirmed by the Pope.⁷ Towards the close of the fifteenth century, the right of election was gradually wrested from the clergy by James the Third, although he had previously passed an Act in their favour;¹ and in 1550 the right of appointment to the vacant benefices belonged solely to the Crown. Thus, although William Kennedy was elected in 1520 by his own monks,² Abbot Quintin was in 1550 appointed by the Crown;³ and in 1565 we find the actual gift of the Abbacy by Queen Mary to Allan Stewart.⁴

Abbot William was a man of influence and ability. While devoting a great portion of his time to the duties of monastic life, to the encouragement of literature among his little community, to the erection of many beautiful buildings within the Convent walls, and to the management of the vast landed estates belonging to the Abbey,—he yet continued to take an active part in the political events of the day. During the twenty-seven years of his Régime, he was eight times present in the National Parliament.⁵ He was twice a Commissioner of State,⁶ once a Commissioner for the discussion of the “Dooms,”⁷ and a member of the Privy Council.⁸ Besides the Abbacy of Crosraguel he held for many years the Commendatorship of the opulent Abbey of Holywood.⁹ He was an intimate friend of Gavin Dunbar, Archbishop of Glasgow, and of Henry, Bishop of Galloway; while his position as “Tutour” to the young Earl of Cassillis brought him into contact with all the leading men of the time.

Among the charters of this period are three writs of great interest relating to Knockgarron,¹ showing the ancient solemnities of the former surrender of land by the owner on bended knees, within the monastic chapter-house, and the subsequent delivery to the heir by the symbolical staff and baton. A charter full of interest to the archæologist occurs in 1520,² being a grant of land by Sir James Douglas, a prebendary of the church of Maybole.

On the assassination of the second Earl of Cassillis in 1527, the young earl, then in his 12th year, was placed under the guardianship of the Abbot; who for eleven years watched over his nephew's interests with paternal care. Many instances occur at this period of the thoughtfulness which he displayed in his dealings with the Kennedies of Blairquhan, and in providing for the widow of the murdered earl. In 1528 he was summoned before the Secret Council,³ together with nearly every member of the clan Kennedy, for the slaughter of the Laird of Lochfergus, but he appears to have been acquitted. He attended the great meeting of the Scottish Estates in the same year, when the attainder was passed upon the Douglasses.⁴

In April 1530 Abbot William obtained a royal license or "sauvgarde" to pass to France and other places beyond seas on his pilgrimage to Rome,⁵ whither many of the Scottish prelates were now going, to keep in favour with the Papal Court at the cry of "Breakers ahead." In this year, too, a learned monk of Crosraguel died, named Michæus, the author of many theological treatises.¹ The monks also lost a great benefactress, and the Abbot a personal friend, in the death of Egidia Blair, Lady Row of Baltersan. By her will, which is preserved,² she appointed the Abbot her executor, bequeathing to the monastery twenty pounds, and directing her body to be buried at Crostraguel, in S. Mary's aisle. Recent excavations at the Abbey have discovered her tomb, and prove her instructions to have been literally carried out. Through her decease the Abbey gained a royal signature to the gift of her land of Row.

Abbot William must have returned from his pilgrimage in 1532, for we find him attending the Parliament of that year which instituted the College of Justice.³ In 1534 he leased the parsonage fruits of the church of Straiton to James Kennedy of Blairquhan⁴—the first instance of a lease in these documents—and in 1535 he was again in Parliament.⁵ Two valuable letters, facsimiles of which are given, were written to him by Henry, Bishop of Galloway, in 1536,⁶ regarding the churches of Inch and Leswalt, which had been let to the young Earl of Cassillis.

On the earl attaining his majority in 1538, the Abbot was relieved from the tutorship, and discharged his former ward from all the duties incidental to the various lands.⁷ This young nobleman had profited by his uncle's excellent training, and took a prominent part in the stirring events of the day.

He was taken prisoner at the battle of Solway Moss and conveyed to England, where he embraced the Reformed religion. The Abbot was meantime appointed Commissioner for holding the Parliament after that crushing defeat,¹ and his vote is recorded as having been cast for Arran as governor of the kingdom. But troubles appear to have arisen around his own monastery. The long-continued absence of the earl, and his second departure into England, evoked a letter in 1544 from the aged prelate,² wherein he entreats him to return home, for there were “mony cummeris and veray grit trublis now, and mony unfreindis and fewer freindis.” The Scottish clergy were in fact beginning to realise that the old Church was in danger. Doubtless it was this sense of insecurity that prompted the Archbishop of Glasgow, Gavin Dunbar, to deposit in 1546 all his treasure and personal effects in the hands of his friend the Abbot of Crosraguel. The Archbishop’s will,³ which is printed here in full, discloses an enormous amount of wealth to have been entrusted to the Abbot’s keeping. Richly embroidered vestments, gold and silver goblets, jewels of the rarest kinds, a valuable library, and nearly four thousand pounds in money, formed the nucleus of the Prelate’s property; and the entrusting of them to the care of Abbot William is a sure sign of the high estimation in which he was held by a great man like Gavin Dunbar.

We find that the Abbot was busy and energetic to the last. In 1546 a Lord Commissioner for holding the Parliament which attainted the murderers of Cardinal Beaton;¹ elected a member of the Privy Council in the same year;² in the winter of 1546 at St. Andrews, busily concerned with the domestic affairs of his Abbey; and in the spring of 1547 present at the last Parliament of his life.³ He had spent it well, in the service of his monastery, his country, his sovereign, and his church; and, in an age when the lives of all the Scottish prelates were not perhaps emblems of perfection, it is notable that not a breath of slander sullied the blameless life of William Kennedy.

§ 6. The Abbey under Quintin Kennedy.—1547-1564.

During the next seventeen years—a period fraught with momentous consequences to Scotland—the monks of Crosraguel were ruled by the most ardent champion of the Established Church. Distinguished as a historian, a theologian, and a scholar, famed for his piety and his courage in resisting the steady current of Reformed opinion, Quintin Kennedy was emphatically a man abreast of his age. He was born in 1520,⁴ the year of his uncle's election to the Abbacy of Crosraguel. His father was the second Earl of Cassillis, his mother Lady Isabel Campbell. He received his early education at St. Andrews, his name occurring among the students incorporated in 1540 at S. Salvator's College. Thence he proceeded to Paris to complete his studies, where he gained the friendship of his future antagonist, John Davidson, who in 1563 spoke of the “auld Parisiane kyndnes that was betuix us.” On his return from France he was appointed by his uncle the Abbot to the vicarage of Girvan.¹ He never was Prior of Whithorn, as Mackenzie, with his usual inaccuracy, has stated. On the death of his brother Thomas at the battle of Pinkie he was presented to the benefice of Penpont,² and he succeeded his uncle in the Abbacy of Crosraguel in the autumn of 1547.³

The Earl of Cassillis had been entrusted by the monks with the guardianship of their monastery on the death of Abbot William ;⁴ and the first act of the new superior was to discharge the Earl of “all sums of money, goods, and gear,” intromitted with by him during his guardianship,⁵ and to acknowledge the faithfulness with which he had executed his trust. There were now eight brethren in residence at Crosraguel, with their Abbot Quintin and their Sub-Prior Robert MacEwen.⁶ They lost about this time from their number one Gilbert Macbrayar,⁷ who is recorded as having made many sumptuous additions to the Abbey buildings. Quintin Kennedy was probably the first Abbot to occupy the stately mansion to the south-east of the cloister.

Quintin was thrice present at the Privy Council in 1548,⁸ and bore his part in the discussions which followed the defeat of the Scottish forces at Pinkie. During the next ten years he was too busily engaged with his theological studies to pay much attention to affairs of State, though he was at the Parliament of 1554, and signed the bond "warranting the Duke of Châtelherault from meddling with the Royal Purse."¹ The following is a complete list of his works :²—

- (i.) "A Compendius Tractive conform to the Scripturis of Almyehtie God, Ressoun, and Authoritie, declaring the nerrest and onlie way to establishe the Conscience of ane Christiane manne in all matters concerning Faith and Religioun."

The manuscript is in the Auchinleck Library. The work created an immense sensation at the time that it was published; and in his reply to it John Davidson acknowledged that by its means "many persons were movit to continew still in their auld superstitioun and idolatrie, who otherwise would have embraced the sincere and trew religioun of Christ befor these dayis, gif it had been suppressit in its infancie."

(xi.) “ De presentia corporis in Sacramento altaris.”

He also wrote a learned work on the “Judge of Controversies” in eighteen chapters, giving a detailed history of the Church Councils from early times.

In these ten years before the Reformation many important charters occur relating to the Abbey lands. In 1552 we find a lease by the Abbot to the Earl of Cassillis of the teinds of Straiton church for the annual payment of £80 ;¹ another to David Kennedy of Pennyglen of the lands of Baltersan and Knockronald ;² a third to one John Kirkpatrick of the lands of Clonlicht.³ We have also a singular agreement between the Abbot and Sir Hew Kennedy of Girvanmains, by which Sir Hew was, under certain conditions, to pay to the Abbot and his successors 180 salmon yearly from the Water of Girvan.⁴

On the establishment of the Reformed religion by the Parliament of 1560, Abbot Quintin displayed marvellous energy in defence of his monastery. A zealous supporter of the policy of the Queen Regent, and himself supported by the powerful protection of Cassillis, he was fortunate in preserving Crosraguel from the fate of others among the Scottish monasteries. Yet we find his name among those condemned by the first General Assembly of the Reformed Church,⁵ together with the Earls of Cassillis and Eglinton, the Laird of Kirkmichael, and the parishioners of Maybole, Girvan, Kirkoswald, and Dailly. Notwithstanding the stringent enactments of the new Parliament, in Ayrshire and Galloway the new doctrines were long in taking root among the mass of the country people; and the influence of Abbot Quintin was mainly devoted to opposing them.

In 1561 the death-knell of the ancient monasteries was sounded. From Inverness and Elgin in the north, to Dryburgh and Whithorn in the south, the work of iconoclasm proceeded with ruthless violence. On the passing of the Act of Privy Council that "Idolatrie and all monumentis thair of suld be suppressit throughout the hail realme," the Earls of Arran, Glencairn, and Argyle, were despatched to the West to carry out the behest of the Congregation. We are told that they cast down Failfurd, Kilwinning, and "a part of Crosraguel."¹ How large a part that was, the shattered ruins of the once stately edifice are a silent witness. Abbot Quintin and his powerful patron could save the Abbey from total destruction, but they were unable to stem the torrent of popular feeling which had been aroused by the eloquence of Knox.

In this year, 1561, the Privy Council ordained that the annual revenues of every benefice in the kingdom should be calculated,² out of which the Catholic clergy were to pay one-third to the Queen, and to keep the remainder to themselves. The valuation of Crosraguel was given in at £409 : 13 : 4,³ from which £100 was to be paid to the Crown. The actual value of the benefice was undoubtedly greater. In 1275 the Abbey was valued for Bagimont's Roll at £533 : 6 : 8,¹ and in 1564 the whole benefice was leased to the Earl of Cassillis for 700 marks, or £466 : 13 : 4.² Yet the Abbot stoutly resisted the payment of the "Third," and he even incurred the pains of "horning" for refusing to deliver it to the Crown.³ To the day of his death he worked hard to keep alive in his countrymen the old attachment to the Catholic faith. His famous disputation with John Knox at Maybole, a full account of which is given in the text,⁴ lasting three days, and terminating with little definite result, proved him to be an antagonist well worthy of the Reformer's steel. He also challenged Willock to a controversy at Ayr in 1559, and sent a whole cartload of books to the market-place there to overwhelm him. Willock waited until ten in the morning for his opponent, who on his arrival found the preacher flown, and nailed a protest to the market-cross.⁵

Quintin died at Crosraguel on the 22d of August 1564.⁶ There is no authority for the statement that he met his end by poison.⁷ He was undoubtedly among the greatest and best of the Catholic clergy, and a worthy successor to Abbot William. He devoted the greater part of his life to combating the doctrines of the Reformers, a task for which his noble birth, his great talents, and his scholarly attainments eminently fitted him. He was not canonised at his death.⁸ He earned the esteem both of those who agreed and who differed with his opinions ; and the epigram on his life by one of the latter, Archbishop Adamson, is worth recording :—¹

“ Væ mihi quod dederam Papæ nomenque fidemque,

 Væ vobis, Papistæ omnes, nisi tempore vitæ
 Vos Christum amplexi Pontificem fugitis.”

The Reformation was now an accomplished fact. The old order had changed, giving place to the new. The Catholic religion existed only on sufferance. Many of the monasteries had already succumbed to the force majeure of fire and sword. The inmates of these ancient sanctuaries had fled from their homes, and administered the offices of religion at the peril of their lives ; while a general scramble for the wealthy property of the Church ensued among the great nobles. Croraguel, as we have already seen, had been rescued from total extermination by the Abbot and the Earl of Cassillis, who was at that time a zealous Catholic. On the 6th of July 1561, the Primate of Scotland had issued a Commission consisting of Thomas Hay, Abbot of Glenluce, John, Abbot of New Abbey, and two canons of Glasgow Cathedral, to confirm to the earl the office of Heritable Bailie of the Regality of Croraguel,² which had been granted to him by the forethought of Abbot Quintin in 1559. The ceremony had been solemnly performed by the Commissioners in the church of Maybole on the 4th October 1562,³ in the presence of the Abbot and Convent at the time of High Mass; and three months before his death Abbot Quintin had followed the universal example then prevalent of leasing the whole benefice to the Earl for the annual payment of 700 marks.¹

The monks fled in every direction on the devastation of the monastery. We find, however, that they gradually re-assembled, and in Croraguel they continued to lead their regular life until at least 1592²—a later period, probably, than in any monastery in Scotland.

There was no Abbot for the first year after the death of Quintin Kennedy. On the 9th of October 1564 the Queen rewarded the literary talents of the celebrated George Buchanan by conferring on him under a Gift of Privy Seal a pension of five hundred pounds from the Abbey lands.³ He also received the whole temporality of the Abbey, with the monastic buildings. The Earl of Cassillis had taken possession of the latter since the Abbot's decease, and Buchanan had to obtain letters from the Privy Council ordaining the Earl to surrender the "Place."⁴

On the 19th of July 1565 we have a gift of the Abbacy by Queen Mary to Allan Stewart,⁵ brother to the Laird of Cardonald, in Renfrewshire, who was one of her staunchest adherents. Allan Stewart, though a man of good family and education, was totally unfitted to cope with the difficulties in which he found himself placed. Of a grasping and avaricious nature, and a character weak and vacillating, he took a continuous but inconsistent part in the fierce feuds which desolated the shire of Ayr. He made the alienation of the vast landed possessions of the Abbey the main object of his life. We have a mass of charters, leases, and other documents signed by him, which are full of the greatest interest for the information they give us of the extent of the Abbey Regality, the different tenures of the various lands, the many forms of "reddendo," the ancient names and values of the farms in Carrick, the details regarding the fishing, the hunting, the woods, the coalpits, the mills of the monks, with their various occupations and pursuits. Allan Stewart should rightly be styled Commendator, as he was not of the Cluniac order, though a priest and master of arts. The gift of the Abbacy to him was a purely secular grant, and might with equal effect have been made to a layman in commendam. Yet he was duly confirmed to the Abbacy by the Archbishop of St. Andrews in his threefold capacity as Primate of Scotland, Legate a latere, and Superior of Crosraguel as Abbot of Paisley.¹ And in further ratification we have the Papal grant by Pius the Fifth in 1566.²

The instrument of Abbot Allan's canonical institution is a valuable document,³ giving several references to the church and other buildings; while the loneliness of the place may be seen from the circumstance that none of the fraternity were present save Sir Michael Dewar, afterwards the Sub-Prior.

We now come to a long string of charters and leases signed by the Abbot in favour of James Stewart and the Earl of Cassillis.⁴ Into the legal aspect of these transactions, or into the number of times that the Commendator contradicted himself in these indiscriminate grants of his property, it is unnecessary to enter. Their main interest centres in their historical value. Most of them are signed by the Abbot and four of the monks. They are not dated beyond 156-; and as they were in the Abbot's possession in 1570,¹ we may infer that James Stewart never received them.

In February 1566 the Earl of Cassillis, a man capable at times of courageous and heroic action, though possessed of a violent and impulsive temper, which led him into acts of great cruelty and oppression, obtained a lease of the Abbacy from the Queen and Henry Darnley, free from all rent.² This virtually annulled the grant of the previous year to Allan Stewart, and led to the complications which followed. Four parties were interested in the Abbacy—the Abbot, Cassillis, Buchanan, and the Laird of Cardonald. Buchanan, though he styled himself “Pensionarius de Crostraguel,”³ had great difficulty in drawing his pension regularly; and in April 1568 he disposed of it “to Allan Stewart for the yearly payment of £500.”⁴ In the following January he assigned it to Cassillis, complaining that it had been “restand owand” to him for several years past.⁵ By this assignation the earl agreed to pay him the sum of 980 marks. And in 1573 Buchanan finally sold his pension to the Laird of Bargany for the annual sum of £400.⁶ He was glad to be freed from the burdens of collecting it, even at a considerable pecuniary loss. We do not know that he ever resided at Crosraguel, though for many years he had the exclusive right to the possession of the buildings.

Allan Stewart began to get into bad odour with his neighbours about the year 1569. In that year he was put to the horn for the murder of certain gentlemen at Langside ;¹ and Thomas Kennedy obtained letters of caption against him, and detained him in his mansion of Bargany.² The Abbot, however, secured his liberty by royal letters of relaxation in the January of 1570. He had previously granted many of the Abbey lands to the Lairds of Pennynglen and Brunston,³ who had rendered him substantial aid against his many enemies in that lawless district. They had paid him large sums to be spent on the repair of the Abbey buildings ; but the Abbot's avarice proved too strong for his intentions to restore them, for the repairs were never even commenced.

The climax of this unhappy man's misfortunes arrived in the autumn of 1570. The "Roasting of the Abbot" has been exaggerated by many writers. The original documents, comprising the Abbot's complaint to the Privy Council and Bannatyne's overdrawn account, are given in full for what they are worth.⁴ The Earl took undeniably cruel and violent measures to compel the Abbot to ratify documents which he had previously signed, and which he now refused to acknowledge. But there is a vein of exaggeration pervading the whole story ; and those who compare the signature of the “half-roasted hand”¹ with the same autograph of a slightly later date² will hardly detect a difference. It is of greater interest to notice how the whole of Carrick was stirred at the tyranny of the Earl. The siege of Dunure³ and the release of the tortured prelate;⁴ the summoning of Cassillis before the Privy Council in Edinburgh;⁵ the sureties on the Earl’s part never to molest the Abbot, under the penalty of two thousand pounds;⁶ the annual payment by the Earl to the Abbot by way of solatium for his injuries,⁷ on the latter surrendering to him the place, orchard, wood, and four-merk land of Crosraguel, with the key of the principal tower of the Abbey—all these are full of interest and characteristic of the time. The final pacification was effected by Lord Boyd, to the satisfaction of all parties concerned.⁸ The Abbot surrendered to the Earl a number of charters of the Abbacy, his own provision to the Commendatorship, and “all other evidents that he had of the same,” in return for 5100 marks—an enormous sum of money in those days. Owing to this agreement we have many of the Abbey charters preserved in the Culzean charter-chest, and since its date most of the landed property of the Abbey has remained with the Cassillis family.

The feuds which arose between Cassillis and the Laird of Bargany through the Abbot’s imprisonment were partially pacified by a decree of the Privy Council in 1572.⁹ Bargany had held the Castle of Dunure, where the unfortunate Allan had been “roasted,” until April in 1571, when the Earl was relaxed from his horning; and in 1572 the Council passed a special Act thanking him for his dutiful service. In the following July we have a letter from the Regent to Cassillis, bidding him come at once to Leith, and to bring some money to satisfy Buchanan’s pension.¹ The poet-historian had been clamouring in vain for payment.

Amongst the other deeds of this period we find a renunciation by the Laird of Bargany of all right to the Abbey lands,² and a writ by James Stewart to the same effect.³ The Earl was therefore at this time sole proprietor of the regality. We have also some further charters by the Abbot to him, in return for large sums of money,⁴ with a lease or assedation of the Manor Place.⁵

Allan Stewart was, in fact, ready to dispose of the last shred of his property to the most willing buyer. John Kennedy of Pennyglen,⁶ the Lairds of Baltersan,⁷ Balserroch,⁸ and others, all received charters from what had formerly been one of the most extensive ecclesiastical territories in Scotland. These numerous alienations had one peculiar result—that when the Act of Annexation was passed in 1587,⁹ there was nothing at Crosraguel left to annex except the buildings of the monastery.

Allan Stewart died in the autumn of 1587. He had spent most of his life at Crosraguel, drawing up deeds for the disposal of the Abbey lands, and his leisure hours in partaking in the many feuds which at that time desolated the country. He took little interest in affairs of State. He was twice present in Parliament at the close of his life—in October 1579 and July 1582.¹ His visits to the metropolis were principally connected with the various lawsuits in which he was embroiled. It is marvellous that so weak a man could have kept his monastery together in an age of tumult ; but the fact remains that the monks of Crosraguel were leading as regular and holy a life in the year of their Abbot's death as in the days of Abbot Patrick. One of their number was actually censured by the General Assembly in 1587² for profaning the Sacraments. An interesting episode in the same year was the capture of Lord Maxwell at the Abbey gate, after he had raised the standard of revolt as a loyal Catholic upon the execution of his Queen.³

§ 8. The later History of the Abbey.—1587-1650.

The death of Abbot Allan and the Act of Annexation took place in the same year. King James had thus an important benefice in his gift, and he decided to confer the Commendatorship of Crosraguel upon John Vaus, eldest son of Sir Patrick Vaus of Barnbarroch.⁴ Sir Patrick had rendered yeoman service to the Court in going to Denmark as Special Ambassador, and also as Senator of the College of Justice.⁵ The gift of the Abbacy to his son was thus a signal mark of royal favour. Sir Patrick had considerable trouble in collecting the rents of his benefice,—or rather the feuduties, as most of the lands had been already disposed to Cassillis.¹ We have a notice of the “poor men in the Abbey yairds,” in 1589,² which alludes to the aged retainers of the Abbey who had been pensioned off; and a very remarkable reference to the “monks” who were still in residence at Croraguel in 1592.³

In that year Sir Andrew Melvill of Garvok, who had been Master of the Household to Queen Mary, and had accompanied his unhappy sovereign to the scaffold, received a ratification of a yearly pension of 400 marks and 8 chalders of oats from the Abbacy. This was afterwards confirmed to him by Act of Parliament in 1597.⁴

Sir John Vaus had a comparatively brief tenure of the Manor Place of Croraguel. In 1603 he received a note from the King, requesting him to sign a demission of the place and monastery in favour of his “darrest sone” Prince Henry, without prejudice, however, to his rights to the rents and duties of the Abbacy.⁵ King James intended to have it restored as a future residence for the young Prince, but there is no historical evidence that Prince Henry ever actually lived there. Sir John resigned or sold the Commendatorship shortly after this demission, for in 1616 one Peter Hewatt was installed in the Abbacy.⁶

Mr. Hewatt, who has been described as “a man fit for making troubles,"¹ enjoyed the profits of Crostraguel for at least thirty years. He was Commissioner of State in 1617,² and in the same year he convened the church vassals of the Abbacy for the payment of a national tax.³ On the 28th of June an Act was passed annexing the whole benefice of Crostraguel, both spirituality and temporality, to the Bishopric of Dumblane;⁴ the emoluments of which were at that time insufficient to support a bishop. The vested interests of the Abbacy were, however, secured to Mr. Hewatt, who was granted his own liferent, with all the other duties belonging to the Abbey lands. He also secured a ratification of the teinds of the new church of Ballantrae,⁵ which had just been erected at considerable cost by the Laird of Bargany. The annexation of the Abbacy of Crostraguel to the Bishopric of Dumblane was ratified by the Parliament of 1633,⁶ and eight years later a special Act was passed in favour of Peter Hewatt, the Commendator.⁷ By virtue of this, Mr. Hewatt was, in consideration of his advanced age and his inability to support himself and his family, confirmed in the rent of the Abbacy during his life; with the additional proviso that his family should enjoy it for nineteen years after his decease. He had meanwhile been a minister in Edinburgh, but lost his living there in the religious turmoil at the metropolis during the early part of the seventeenth century, when he had even suffered imprisonment. He died in 1650.⁸

The revenues of Crostraguel were therefore enjoyed by the Bishop of Dumblane for a few years. On the final overthrow of Episcopacy in 1689,¹ all that remained of them, consisting of a small property in land, and the patronage of the five churches of Straiton, Ballantrae, Dailly, Kirkoswald, and Girvan, were annexed to the Crown, together with the buildings and “precincts” of the Abbey. Since the recent Act of Parliament abolishing Church patronage, the sole relic of the great Regality of Crosraguel is the small plot of ground, enclosing the ruins of what was one of the simplest, yet one of the most beautiful, specimens of Gothic architecture in Scotland. Within its walls the royal Bruces had attended the ministrations of Holy Church. Through three and a half centuries of the dark ages of Scottish history it had nurtured generations of pious and learned men in a part of the country where the sword was ever more in fashion than the pen. There are many breaks in the chain of continuous events. Yet in bringing these memorials of the Abbey’s history to a close, the Editor would gladly hope that they may be still connected by those who in time coming may complete the story of Crosraguel.

II.—THE REGALITY OF THE ABBEY.

THE territorial estates of the Abbots of Crosraguel were of the largest extent. The greater part of Carrick, or Ayrshire south of the Doon, owed allegiance to them ; and from Elsberry Head to Ballantrae, and inland to the parish church of Straiton and the mountainous district which borders upon Kirkcudbrightshire, were to be found at one time lairds, yeomen, and farmers, subject to the royal power with which the monks were invested. The Regality of Croraguel extended over eight of the parishes of Carrick—Girvan, Dailly, Straiton, Ballantrae, Kirkoswald, Maybole, Kirkmichael, and Barr—the last being in mediæval times represented by the Chapel of Kirkdominie or Kirkdamdie. Over the first five of these churches the monks enjoyed exclusive rights.¹ Their property was divided into two separate portions; (1) the temporality, or the revenue derived from lands and other secular sources;² (2) the spirituality, consisting of the teinds and other emoluments accruing from the ecclesiastical dues of parish churches.³ The teinds were again subdivided into the teind sheaves, or the decimæ garbales,⁴ consisting of the tenth sheaf taken from every harvest field; and the vicarial teinds, or decimæ fœni, of which hay was the principal feature, and which was gathered with the yearly tithes of stock, lambs, calves, and other produce. This subdivision of Church property in early times was well exemplified in the case of Croraguel. Of the five churches belonging to the Abbey, over which they could exercise their right of patronage, the monks appointed a vicar, who enjoyed the lesser teinds, to Girvan,⁵ Ballantrae,⁶ and Straiton;⁷ while they appropriated to themselves all the revenues of Dailly and Kirkoswald, and appointed a chaplain to serve the cure at those churches.⁸ The rectorial or greater teinds were in all cases enjoyed by the Abbot as parson impersonæ.

These lands all differed in their annual rental, in their mode of cultivation, and in their natural fertility. The most valuable were the farms on the banks of the Girvan and the Doon ; the poorest were the moorland hills in the parish of Straiton and round the Chapel of Kirkdamdie. They varied again, from the pennylands of Croraguel and Southblane to the sixteen-merk lands and the forty-shilling lands of old extent, such as Duneyn, Knockgarron, and Lokistoun. Into the vexed question of the origin and meaning of these valuations we need not enter. Suffice it to say that the best authorities agree that the amount expressed something like $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent of their real value at the time of the Reformation.¹

In the absence of the Chartulary or any Rental book we have to glean all the details regarding the management of these vast landed estates from the charters themselves. The monks were excellent farmers and good landlords. Their tenants were free from all military service, and had thus more leisure for agriculture and gentle pursuits than their neighbours, who held of the great barons of Cassillis, Blairquhan, and Culzean, and who, as vassals, were liable at the shortest notice to be summoned to arms. The tenantry of Croraguel consisted of the cottars,² who occupied a croft and paid a small rent for it; and the farmers, who paid it chiefly in grain.³ A third class of vassals were the yeomen or small lairds of such places as Knockgarron,⁴ Pennyglen,⁵ Balserroch,⁶ or Clonlicht,⁷ who held land in the regality, and were thus subject to the authority of the Abbot. An incident of their tenure was their annual attendance at the court held by him on the lands of Auchinblane,⁸ where they were with the other tenantry to renew every year their allegiance to their feudal superior.

Some of the “feu-duties” or “feu-mails” due to the Abbey from those to whom lands were granted, are worthy of record. Thus, for a ten-merk land of old extent, the reddendo was 36 bolls bere, 2 dozen and 2 capons;¹ for a four-merk land, 80 bolls horse corn;² for the merk land of Straiton, £3 : 6 : 8; and 12 capons,³ or sometimes 12 moor-fowl;⁴ for the salmon-fishings at the mouth of the Girvan, 3 dozen salted salmon between the feasts of the Nativity and Purification;⁵ for the whole fishing of the river, 180 salmon a year.⁶

The fishings in the Water of Girvan were thus a valuable property. The monks do not appear to have had any right to those on the Doon or the Stinchar; nor had they any fish-ponds in the immediate proximity of the Abbey itself.

Other sources of large revenue to the monks were the mills, the coalpits, and the woods. Their two mills are the subject of constant allusion in these charters. One stood on the stream which still flows past the gateway;⁷ the other at Drumgarloch, about two miles distant, on the sea.⁸ To one or other of these mills all the tenants were bound, and we have frequent notices of the multures, or the grain paid the miller;⁹ the sucken;¹⁰ and the sequels, or petty dues.¹¹ The tenants were all termed suckeners, and are spoken of as being thirled to the mills.

The monks were from the earliest times diligent workers of the coalpits at Yellowlee and other places in the neighbourhood;¹² and the “coal-heughes”¹³ and “coal-pottis”¹⁴ are enumerated in several of the charters. We do not find that they were actually worked before the sixteenth century in Carrick, though in other parts of Scotland coal was a source of wealth so far back as the thirteenth.¹ The wood was another valuable pertinent of the Abbacy. In early times the country round the monastery consisted of one large forest, and we have frequent reference to the woods and wood hag,² or annual wood cutting, the benefits of which were enjoyed by the monks. They had also “brewlands”³ and “brewhouses”⁴ near the Abbey, and appear to have emulated the legendary example of their brethren of Failfurd in brewing good ale. Over the vassals in their Regality the monks could exercise an almost boundless jurisdiction. From the date of the great charter by Robert the Third in 1404 until the Reformation, the Abbots of Crosraguel were, from the extent of their possessions, the importance of their office, and the almost royal power with which they were invested, the greatest personages in all Ayrshire; and no history of the county could be complete which failed to recognise the civilising and controlling force of the Regality. We have seen how the third Earl of Cassillis was appointed Heritable Bailie of the Abbey by one of the Abbots in 1562.⁵ This office, with all its lucrative adjuncts, descended in the Cassillis family until the passing of the Act abolishing heritable jurisdictions in 1747. The Earl of Cassillis of that day claimed £12,100 as compensation for the loss of income from their abolition, including £1000 for the Lordship of the

Regality of Crosraguel, and was awarded £1800 by the Parliamentary Commissioners.¹

III. THE CONVENTUAL SEAL.

THE Common Seal of Crosraguel was singular in retaining the same impression throughout the existence of the monastery, though the matrix was replaced once or twice. The design was a rich one, of delicate workmanship, displaying a figure of the Virgin with the Infant Jesus in her arms, sitting within a richly panoplied niche. The background is diapered, and in the base there is a group of four monks praying. The circumscription is :—

SIGILL'V : BEATE MARIE DE CROSREGMEL.

It was a single seal, without the reverse impression found in other cases. The earliest impression preserved is attached to a charter (No. 13) dated about 1360, from the Culzean Muniments, an engraving of which is given here.

The Conventual Seals attached to others of these charters so late as 1573 agree in every particular with this specimen, from which we may assume that the same matrix was in use so long as there were charters to sign and abbots to sign them.

An engraving is given in Laing's Catalogue¹ of another Crosraguel Seal, taken from a charter by the abbot and convent in 1546, from General Hutton's Collections. This is identical with the others; but we must notice that the allusion to the Crosraguel Seal appended to the citatory letter from Abbot John of Paisley in 1370,² gives a slightly different circumscription, namely : Sigillum Abbatis Monasterii de Crosragmol. This may, however, be only a clerical error. No instance occurs of a Crosraguel Abbot affixing his private seal to any letters or documents, as was frequently the case elsewhere.

Many of the other seals engraved are of exceptional interest; notably those of Malcolm de Carrick in 1370;³ of James Stewart of Cardonald in 1571;⁴ and of the Official General of the Diocese of Glasgow in 1500;⁵ which are all in fine preservation, and characteristic of their different dates.

IV. ALLUSIONS TO CROSRAGUEL BY ANCIENT WRITERS.

THE following curious notices of the Abbey have been gleaned from some writers of the past and previous centuries. Mr. Abercrombie, the Episcopal minister of Maybole at the close of the seventeenth century, thus alludes to it :⁶—

⁶ Description of Curriek, in Pitcairn's History, p. 167.

“ In this countrey Religion has had the influence upon the people to dispose them to the founding and endowing many places for devotion ; for though there be but one monasterie in all this country, viz. Crossraguel, within two myles of Mayboll, westward ; which, besyd other revenue, enjoyed the tythes of these five parishes, viz. Kirkoswald, Dailie, Girvan, Ballantrae, and Straton ; which enjoyed the jurisdiction of Regality within itselfe, to which all its vassals and tenants were answerable ; yet were there also severall other pious foundations and dotations. There is the Munkland, ane 100 merkland of old extent, which is an appendage of the Abbacy of Melrose, and had a separate Jurisdiction of its owne, for ministring justice to all the vassals and tenants thereof. The Laird of Ardmillan, one of the vassals, was Heretable Bailie ; and upon the parcelling of his fortune, was acquired by Kennedy of Grange.”

The parish of Ballantrae is of a great extent. Though the people be not numerous, the Clachan is pretty populous. The patron hereof is the King, and the Lord Bargany pretends mightily to it ;¹ but upon examination it will be found to belong to the Abbacy of Crosseragwell.

The parish of Daillie lyes in length east and west on both sides of Girvan ; more populous than spacious. The patron hereof is the Bischop of Dumblain, in the right of the Abbacy of Crosseraguel.

The parish of Kirkoswald is pretty populous, because of the coast syde whereof it consists, and is all the pleasure thereof ; for the place of the churche's situation is very obscure and unpleasant, being 'twixt two hills at the end of a bogue and marish. The Patron hereof is the Bishop of Dumblain, in the right of the Abbacy of Crosseragwell. The fabrick of which abbey stands within the parish. The monks were of the Cistercian order. The situation thereof is no ways pleasant. The fabrick of the church is entire, without a rooffe. Much of the building is demolished, yet there be two towers still standing entyre in ther walls. It stands about midway 'twixt Mayboll and Kirkoswald. The houses of the gentry residing in this parish are The Cove, Thomastowne, Beltersan, and Balsarach, and Thrave. The two last are obscure countrey dwellings ; but Beltersan is a stately, fyne house, with gardens, orchards, parks, and woods about it ; lying from Mayboll about ane myle's distance.”

The following is an amusing version of the foundation of the abbey from an old Advocates' Library MS.²—

And we have the following from an ancient description of Carrick from Sir James Balfour’s Collections.¹—

“In this Iylland there is the ruines of ane old Castell and Chapell,³ possest by the Earls of Cassillis, quo holds the same of the Abbey of Corsreguall. It is not much above a myle in circumference, being one hard and solide rocke, having one its tope a fontaine of cristaline vatter.”

Bishop Lesley⁴ has but one reference to Crostraguel :—

“Supra Galdiam Siluria est, gens olim ut et nunc bellicosissima, quam Tacitus scribit Romanis ipsis infestam atque rebellem semper fuisse. Ejus partes tres numerantur, Carieta situ primo, deinde Kyla, cui adjacet Cunninghamia ; in his tribus, sicut et in Cludisdalia superiore et inferiore illis promissis magna est et nobilium et populi seges : Comites, Reguli (quos Milords dicimus) Equites, Barones, Nobilesque alii plurimi. Carictam a Carictonia numerosissima quondam illi civitate dictam putant : arces multæ splendidæ, arte naturaque munitæ : pagi frequentes sed multo frequentiores (ut ubique apud nos) villæ : agrorum fecunditas his omnibus fere par : pascua uberrima, unde casei optimi, et butyri magna copia : triticum rarius ; cresceret tamen felicissimè plurimis in locis, si sibi quæstini existimantes futurum in id innumerent agricolæ. Littora ubique pisculenta ut et fluvii, lacus, et amnes : sylvæ raræ ; in utraque tamen Cludisdalia frequentiores : monasteria rariora : habet tamen Carieta monasterium Crucis Regalis.”

V. THE ETYMOLOGY OF "CROSRAGUEL."

THE origin of the name remains buried in obscurity. It appears in these charters under no less than forty-one different forms, the most frequent being Crostraguel, Crossraguel, Crossragwell, Corsragwell, Crocereguall, Corsregal, Corsragal, Crostragmer, Crostragmol, Crucis Regalis, Corsragull, Croceragwell, and Crostragin. From so varied a medley of readings it is difficult to extract a satisfactory derivation; but it is something to know that the greatest etymologists of our day have agreed in demolishing the hitherto accepted theory that it signifies "Cross-royal." Upholders of this derivation have pointed with great plausibility to the church of the parish, which is dedicated to S. Oswald, the Northumbrian martyr-king; and they maintain that a cross was erected at this spot after his death. They also ingeniously compare "Cros-oswalde," the Welsh form of Oswestry or Oswald's tree, where he was buried. This is sheer guess work.

The oldest known form of the name is "Crostragmol," in the Bull by Honorius III. to the Abbey of Paisley in 1225.¹ Again it appears under that form in the Scriptum of Crostraguel in 1244,² and again in 1265.³ In 1286 we have "Crostragal,"⁴ and the letter of Henry de Percy is dated from "Crostraguel" in 1306.⁵ In the charters of Robert the First "Crostragmer" appears,⁶ from which time onwards we find every variety of spelling. But not until 1547-8, in a discharge by

Abbot Quintin to the Earl of Cassillis, do we find the Latinized form "Crucis Regalis,"¹ which is a purely arbitrary derivation of the name. It was the fashion at that period to give high-sounding Latin names in place of the old Saxon or Celtic; Vallis Lucis being another case in question. What "Glenluce" meant is hard to say; but it certainly had nothing to do with a "vale of light." After 1565 the form "Crucis Regalis" is almost invariably given by the scribes in the Latin Charters, and has led to the popular interpretation.

Professor Skeat, in a communication to the Editor, says that it is clear that "Crossraguel" cannot mean "Crossregal" or "Crux Reguli." While suggesting that it is a question for a Celtic scholar, he mentions the Gaelic reachdmhor, "fine," or "beautiful." In corroboration of this the minister of Glassford in Lanarkshire mentions a farm of Hiecorseknowe in his parish, the ancient name being Crossraguel.

Professor Rhys, of Jesus College, Oxford, writes: "'Cross Raguel' would seem to construe as a Celtic name, meaning 'Raguel,' which I have searched for in vain. The form 'Ragmer' might be explained in Welsh by supposing it to be the same as 'Rhagfyr,' 'December,' which is supposed to mean 'foreshortened.' I may also mention 'rhagwel,' a look in advance." From the extensive view which the Abbey commands over the surrounding country, this last might be tenable.

Lastly, Professor Donald Mackinnon, of Edinburgh, writes: "'Raguel' ('ragmol,' 'ragmer'), from its position may be either an adjective qualifying 'cross,' or a proper name. I do not know any Gaelic adjective that would represent ‘Ragmol.’ ‘Regal’ certainly would not . . . and I am nearly as certain that ‘reachdmhor’ cannot represent ‘ragmol’ . . . I am strongly inclined to consider it a proper name. Very rarely would a cross be described by an epithet, and all the Highland crosses were erected in memory of a person of note either for his piety or his power. But, besides, ‘Ragmol’ and ‘Ragmer’ are not Gaelic names that I know of. They look like Norse names.” At this Mr. Vigfusson, of Oxford, has kindly suggested “Rognvald,” the same as Ranald, Ronald, or Reginald; but this has also been questioned on etymological grounds.

After carefully sifting all the evidence, the Editor, without attempting to step in and explain where so many greater scholars have failed, is much disposed to regard the termination as the proper name of some hero, either Celtic or Scandinavian, who had fallen in battle near the spot. It seems impossible to identify the original form, and we might not be much the wiser if we knew it. Sir Herbert Maxwell has, just before going to press, given a valuable reference from the Annals of the Four Masters, under the year 743.¹ It runs as follows:—

Anarccac abb Muicin|
Re3uil, do badadh

i.e. “Arasgach, Abbot of Muicinis-Reagail (or Reguil) was drowned”; Muicinis-Reguil being the Hog island of S. Riaguil or Regulus. This would appear to be very strong evidence in favour of the derivation from Cross-Reguli, or the Cross of S.

Regulus ; but it must be a question for the etymologist of the future to decide.

VI. THE ORDER OF CLUNY IN SCOTLAND.

THE Cluniac order was founded in the year 940, when the Duc d'Aquitaine erected the Abbey of Cluny in Burgundy for a reformed order of Benedictine monks. The Duke Bernon and his brother Odo were the first Abbots. Their object was to perfect and renovate the order of S. Benedict, which had fallen into decay ; and before long the Cluniacs became so celebrated that they fairly eclipsed the Benedictines. "In the twelfth century," writes Dr. Lees,¹ "they had nearly 2000 monasteries in allegiance to the Abbey of Cluny. It was the greatest of all abbatial churches, equal to Cologne in beauty, vaster than S. Peter's in magnificence ; though three scanty fragments alone stand to attest the remains of what De Thou called the most beautiful monastery in Christendom. No bishop could intrude within the precincts of the monastery, or exercise any jurisdiction over it. At one time the Abbot of Cluny received £2000 from English Cluniac houses alone." The charters of the mother house are many thousand in number, and at the downfall of the monastery they were conveyed to the National Library at Paris, where they are now being edited by M. Bruel, the Archéviste Publique.

The Cluniacs were Benedictines according to the spirit of their Rule. Their chief peculiarities were:—Two solemn masses every day, and on private sacred days no labour was allowed except out of the hours of divine service. Every day each alternate choir offered their hosts. Communion extended to all three days before Easter. Constant silence was enforced in the daytime, and it was almost death to violate it before prime ; hence we trace the use of signs among them. From the Ides of November the seniors attended meditation in the church ; after matins the juniors studied singing in the Chapter. Manual labour was accompanied by a repetition of the Psalms. Strangers were not admitted after compline, nor was leave of refecton granted to monks after that time, if absent from the common table. Their manual labour (says Udabrinus) was to shell unripe beans, to weed in the garden, and to bake bread in the bakehouse. They also differed from the Benedictine order proper in matters of ritual. They prepared the bread for Holy Communion differently,¹ washing the wheat carefully, and having the bread itself made by the priests. Their discipline was of the strictest nature, and one of their duties was to learn the Psalter by heart.²

Guyot de Provins,³ in his satire on the different religious orders, thus speaks of the Cluniacs :—“ When you want to sleep they wake you ; when you wish to eat they make you fast. The night is spent in praying in the church, the day in labour. No repose is taken save in the refectory ; and what is to be found there ? Rotten eggs, beans with their pods on, liquor fit for oxen (boisson des bœufs). For the wine is so poor that one might drink of it for a month without intoxication.”

³ Quoted by Fosbrooke, British Monachisms, p. 107.

And Brunellus alludes to their extreme asceticism in the same caustic vein :—¹

“Esse niger monachus si forte velim Cluniaci, Ova fabasque nigras cum sale sæpe dabunt.
Surgere me faciunt mediâ de nocte volentem
Amplius in calido membra fovere thoro;
Quodque magis nollem, vellent me psallere sursum,
Et geminare meos in diapente tonos.”

Not many years after its institution the order relapsed greatly from its former severity, and Peter the famous Abbot of Cluny complained to the Pope that his brethren “despise God, and having passed all shame eat flesh all days of the week except Fridays; not only in secret but in public; and that one must beat the bushes for them with great multitudes of hunters, and chase pheasants and partridges and ringdoves, for fear the servants of God perish with hunger.”²

Yet the order of Cluny remained great and powerful until the last century, when it succumbed to the violence of the French Revolution. One of the largest houses of the order in France was the Monastery of La Charité. Thence there came a colony of monks to the Abbey of Wenlock in Shropshire, which was among the earliest of the English Cluniac houses. And when Walter, the first Steward of Scotland, determined to erect a monastery of the order at Paisley, on the banks of the River Cart, it was to Wenlock that he sent for those who were first to lead the religious life in the new monastery. We have already seen how the Abbey of Crosraguel practically owed its existence to the mother house of Paisley ; and we are thus enabled to trace its direct descent from the Abbey of Cluny through the Monasteries of La Charité, Wenlock, and Paisley. A Scottish monk differed in no respect from those resident in other monasteries of the same order ; and the monks of Crostraguel would closely resemble their brethren in England or in France. The monastic habit was a black gown with large wide sleeves and a black cowl, over a white garment.

There were only two other monasteries of the order in Scotland, namely, at Renfrew and Iona ; the latter being a development of the early Christian brotherhood established by S. Columba.

The following were the services in the Church of a Cluniac monastery :—Matins at 12 A.M. ; Prime at 6 ; Tierce at 9 ; Sext at 12 P.M. ; Nones at 2 or 3 ; Vespers at 4 ; Complines at 7. The brethren retired to rest at 9 o'clock.

The community of a large Cluniac Abbey would include the following :—The Abbot, whose power extended over the whole community ; the Prior, whose office appears to have been delegated to a sub-prior at Crostraguel ; the Cellarer ; the Precentor ; the Kitchener ; the Seneschal ; the Sacrist ; the Almoner ; the Novice Master ; the Porter ; the Refectitioner ; the Chamberlain ; the Monks ; the Novices ; the Lay brethren.

Writ of Corsragmol.

William, by the permission of God minister of the Church of Glasgow, to all the faithful in Christ as well present as to come that shall see or hear these present letters, greeting in the Lord: Know all of you that when there was a question moved before us between a noble man Duncan Earl of Carriek¹ on the one part, and the Abbot and convent of Paisley on the other part, concerning a religious house of the order of Paisley in Carriek to be founded at Corsragmol, and concerning the property which the said Abbot and monks possessed in Carriek from the gift of the foresaid Earl, the parties at length of their own free will submitted themselves to our ordinance: Now we having God before our eyes, in favour of and for the increase of religion and order, with the unanimous consent of the parties and with the assent of the Chapter of Glasgow, have ordained after the manner following; to wit, that in the aforesaid place to the honour of God and the blessed Virgin Mary there shall be erected a religious house of monks of the order of Paisley, who shall dwell there in all times to come and enjoy full liberty, and may freely appoint by canonical election an Abbot, who may freely receive to the monastic habit and profession those wishing to pass into the monastic life, and may do all things which of right pertain to an Abbot to do; so also that the said house of Corsragmol may be exempt in all things from the power and jurisdiction of the Abbot and Convent of Paisley, save only in recognition of the order, which we think fit to be declared in this manner: That the monks of Corsragmol in order and habit and other regular observances shall wholly conform to the house of Paisley, and that the Abbot of Paisley who shall be for the time shall visit the said house of Corsragmol once a year with a moderate retinue and without heavy expense; in which visitation if he shall find anything hard or serious to be corrected, in order that all things may proceed with the more mature and advised deliberation, it shall be corrected canonically by us and our successors together with the said visitor: We ordain also that all the said property which the Abbot and convent of Paisley have possessed at any time in Carrick they shall yield for ever to the uses of the said house of Corsragmol, they paying to the house of Paisley ten merks silver¹ yearly at Whitsunday: And if at any time the said Abbot and monks of Paisley or the said Earl or his heirs or the Abbot and monks of Corsragmol wish in any thing to come in contrary of our ordinance, we and our successors may compel by ecclesiastical censure the contraveners to the performance of all the foresaids plainly and without strife of law, first giving them an admonition; also, that nothing shall be of avail to them in the way of impairing the above mentioned, either as an impetration made or to be made, or any remedy of canon or civil law, or any privilege competent or that shall be competent to the Cluniac order,² or specifically the benefit of restitution in integrum, or any statute present or to come: And in witness hereof we and the Chapter of Glasgow and the said Earl of Carrick have confirmed the present writ with our seals. ABSTRACT.

Letters by Pope Clement [the Fourth] directed to the Bishop of Dumblane, the Abbot of the Monastery of Dryburgh of St. Andrews diocese, and Master Roger of Derby, precentor of the Church of Aberdeen; whereby, on the narrative that his beloved sons the Abbot and convent of the Monastery of Paisley, of the Cluniac Order of the diocese of Glasgow, had shown to him in their petition that whereas the deceased Duncan Earl of Carrick had bestowed on them in perpetual alms the right of patronage of the Church of St. Oswald of Turnbery and of sundry other churches, and the lands, possessions, and other goods belonging to him in the diocese of

Glasgow; there was built in the said possessions a certain oratory, in which the said Abbot and convent for many years caused service to be given by some of their monks; afterwards, on the said Earl asserting that he had bestowed the right of patronage, lands, possessions, and goods aforesaid to the said Abbot and convent under this condition that there should be constructed in the said possessions a monastery of the Order abovesaid, to which the churches, lands, possessions, and goods aforesaid should be assigned, and he moving a question upon these things against the Abbot and convent, the parties at length submitted themselves to the ordinance of the Bishop of Glasgow, diocesan of the place, and the Abbot and convent having renounced the benefit of restitutio in integrum, and all benefit of law, canon and civil, and letters purchased from the apostolic see, the said Bishop, with assent of parties and of the Chapter of Glasgow, ordained that a monastery should be erected in the said possessions, which should be called Crosragmol, of monks of the foresaid monastery, who might freely choose an Abbot by canonical election; and that the foresaid monastery so erected should be in all things exempt from the power and jurisdiction of the Abbot and convent of the said Monastery of Paisley, except in conformity in order, habit, and observance, and that the Abbot of Paisley for the time being should visit the foresaid Monastery of Crosragmol once a year: He ordained also that all the goods which the Abbot and convent of the foresaid Monastery of Paisley sometime had in Carriek, they should grant for ever to the uses of the foresaid monastery so to be erected, and that the Abbot and convent for the time being in such monastery should pay an annual rent of ten merks of sterlings every year to the Abbot and convent of Paisley for all the foresaids; and that the said Bishop and his successors might compel the parties to observe the said ordinance, on premonition being given, by ecclesiastical censure, without noise of law. Wherefore the said Abbot and convent of the Monastery of Paisley have humbly supplicated the Pope that forasmuch as this ordinance redounded to the enormous hurt of the said Monastery of Paisley, he should with paternal solicitude provide upon these matters by the benefit of restitutio in integrum. Therefore the Pope charges the said Bishop of Dumblane, Abbot of Dryburgh, and Mr. Roger of Derby, that having summoned those who ought to be summoned, if they find that the foresaid Monastery of Paisley by the said ordinance has sustained enormous loss, notwithstanding the renunciations and instruments thereon, etc., they shall hear the cause, and terminate it by judgment within a year, even if it shall have proceeded by voluntary goodwill of parties ; causing what they should decree to be strictly observed by ecclesiastical censure ; otherwise to remit the cause, instructed or not instructed, to the decision of the apostolic see, prefixing a peremptory competent term, in which, by themselves or suitable procurators, with all muniments and reasons pertaining to the cause, they shall present them for apostolic inspection ; and to compel witnesses to bear witness to the truth by the same censure, notwithstanding of any indulgence, etc. Dated at Perugia, 8 Ides of February, first year of Pontificate [6th February 1265].¹

5. Bull by Clement IV., confirming to the Monks of Paisley the Lands of Crosragmol.—[1269].³

Clemens episcopus servus servorum Dei dilectis filiis abbati monasterii sancti Jacobi et sancti Mirini confessoris de Passelet eisque fratribus tam presentibus quam futuris regularem vitam professis imperpetuum. . . . Preterea quascunque possessiones, quecunque bona idem monasterium impresentiarum juste et canonice possidet aut infuturum, concessione pontificum, largitione regum vel principum, oblatione fidelium, seu aliis justis modis, prestante Domino poterit adipisci, firma vobis vestrisque successoribus et illibata permaneant. In quibus hec propriis duximus exprimenda vocabulis:— . . . Ex dono quondam Duncani comitis de Karrie totam terram de Crosragmol et Sutheblan cum pertinentiis suis . . .

² There is no direct evidence as to the result of this commission, but it appears merely to have confirmed the "Scriptum" of Crosraguel. The learned editor of the Register of Paisley and Dr. Lees have too hastily assumed that it reserved the patronage of the churches of Turnberry, Straiton, and Dailly to Paisley, whereas we know from charter No. 22, infra, that they were confirmed to Crosraguel.

the Verus Valor, not the Antiqua Taxatio as the clergy desired. The amount collected in Scotland was £7195 sterling. Crosraguel was valued at £533:6:4, the same as Balmerino. The most opulent abbey was Arbroath, valued at £4000. The original Roll is still in the Vatican archives, and the fragment of it remaining was copied by Theiner. There are now two copies of it in Scotland, that by Habakkuk Bisset in 1622, and the Libellus alluded to above. V. Statuta Ecclesie Scotticane, p. lxx. Theiner's Uet. Mon., p. 104; MSS. *Adv. ABSTRACT.

Confirmation by Alexander of Hyle, son and heir of Engus, son of Donald lord of Hyle,² of a charter which he had inspected and handled,

² i.e. Lord of the Isles. This charter is not dated, but we may perhaps assume that it was signed at the time of the convention of the Scottish barons at the Earl of Carrick's Castle of Turnberry in Sep. 1286. We know from Rymer's Fœdera (ii. p. 488) that not only were Robert Bruce the Earl and his son Robert (afterwards King Robert I.), both of whom witness this charter, present at the convention, but also Engus son of Donald Lord of the Isles, and Alexander his son. Again, the proximity of the Abbey of Crosraguel which is only a few miles from the castle, and the fact that both the Abbot and one of his convent witnessed the grant, point to the same conclusion (v. Tytler's Hist. i. 75).

granted by his father in favour of the Monastery of Paisley, for the weal of his lord Alexander, illustrious King of Scotland, and of Alexander his son, and for the weal of the granter and his heirs, giving to the said abbey the church of St. Queran, in his land which is called Kyntire: which charter the said Alexander confirms with his seal: but nevertheless, more amply, and that all matter of controversy may be taken away, he gives and confirms the said church to the monks of the said abbey: but lest the fact of his doing so in pious devotion should at any time sink into blind oblivion, he procures the corroboration of the confirmation with his own seal, and also with the seal of Laurence, bishop of Argyll, and that of Sir Robert Brus, earl of Carrick, for greater witnessing. The witnesses being Patrick,¹ abbot of Crosraguel, Robert Bruce, earl of Carrick, Robert, his son and heir, Sir Robert Inglis, knight, Sir Maurice, vicar of Arran, Patrick,² clerk of Kintyre, Sir Nicholas, monk of Crosragwel, etc.

² These two ecclesiastics, Sir Maurice and the clerk, may have brought the Bishop's seal over to Turnberry with them.

³ Henry Percy was appointed keeper of Galloway and the Sherifdom of Ayr in 1296; and in 1306 he was again despatched into Carrick after the coronation of Robert Bruce. He held Turnberry Castle all that year, and Bruce's estate of Carrick was in fact given to him by Edward I. He was at Turnberry when Bruce effected his memorable landing from Arran in the spring of 1307, and evacuated the castle shortly afterwards.—Rymer, i. pt. ii. p. 982; Matt. of West., p. 454; Tytler, vol. i. pp. 93, 128-30; Hemingford, p. 224; Barbour, pp. 83-4, 95.

² An interesting sequel to this letter is printed in the Calendar of Documents relating to Scotland, in the Record Office, in the form of a letter from Edward I. to Sir James Dalilegh, wherein the King expresses great pleasure at his letter reporting that he has sent two engines to Sir Henry de Percy at Lochdoon (sic), and desires that all necessities may be sent there in aid of his business. (No. 1818.)

³ Registrum Magni Sigilli, Roll ii. No. 58. The original of this charter is not preserved, and was probably among the fourteen (out of fifteen) missing Rolls of Robert I.'s reign, which were lost in the removal of the Public Records to England in 1651. The above is copied from the charter of confirmation by Robert II. (v. No. 17, infra, and Reg. Mag. Sigilli, Ed., 1814, p. x. Introd.) The same applies to charters 10 and 11, infra, which are copied respectively from Nos. 18 and 19.

⁴ This is evidently a mistake, as the names of the witnesses prove that it must have been Robert I.

ABSTRACT.

Charter by Robert King of Scots, in favour of the abbot and monks of the Monastery of Crosraguel, of the Cluniae order, that all the lands which they held of the king and his ancestors in the earldom of Carrick, namely, five pennies of the land of Crosragwel and of Suthbarne, one penny of the land called Clenacheth, one penny of the land called Baleeristen¹ Lorkan', two pennies and a half of the tenement of Dunnefyne,² one penny of the land of the Kirk of Kirkoswald, together with the whole lands of their parish churches belonging to them, should thenceforth be held of the king and his heirs in free barony, with gallows³ and pit, toll, theme, sock and sack, outfangthief and infangthief,⁴ with all advantages and freedoms pertaining by law or custom to a free barony in the Kingdom of Scotland; and further, three pennies of land, namely, one of Dalchorane,⁵ one of Corale,⁶ and one of Hachethnevach,⁷ which the aforesaid religious men held by the gift of the deceased Edward, the king's brother, to be possessed by them for ever in free barony. Dated at Berwick upon Tweed in the 18th year of the king's reign (1324), before these witnesses: William Bishop of St. Andrews, William Bishop of Dunkeld, Bernard Abbot of Arbroath, chancellor, Walter Steward of Scotland, and James Lord Douglas, knights.

ABSTRACT.

Notarial Instrument on the visitation by John, Abbot of Paisley, of the Cluniac order, and diocese of Glasgow, of the Abbey of Crostraguel, of the same order and diocese, narrating that on the 27th day of September, in the year 1370, at the Abbey of Crostraguel, compeared the said John Abbot of Paisley, and Roger Abbot of Crostraguel, in presence of Nicholas Burn, notary, and the witnesses there present; and that the said Abbot John requested to be shown to him a citatory letter formerly addressed by him to the said Abbot Roger; which letter having been accordingly delivered to him, he caused it to be publicly read, of which the tenor was to the following effect:—That the said Abbot John, having visited and inspected the state of the Monastery of Crostraguel, with the monks there residing, found many faults and defects, which, for various reasons, he did not fully correct: but charged the said Abbot Roger to warn all his fellow-monks, as well within as outside of the monastery, to compear before him there on the Friday next before the Feast of St. Michael the Archangel then following, at the hour of chapter, to hear and to do those things which belonged to his office: and cited the said Abbot Roger himself to be present at the same time and place, and to return the letter sealed with his seal, in token of his having fully executed the charge; which letter was dated at the Abbey of Paisley on Monday, in the Feast of St. Ninian, 1370, and sealed with two oblong seals of white wax, in the first of which was contained the image of an abbot holding a pastoral staff in his hand, and on the circumference the inscription, "Sigillum Abbatis Monasterii de Passet;" on the second seal was graven the image of St. Mary holding her Son in her hand, and on the circumference was written, "Sigillum Abbatis Monasterii de Crosragmol." After the reading of which letter the said Abbot Roger, of his free will, purely and simply, and without condition, resigned, in presence of his convent, all dignity and prelacy of the state of Abbot of Crosraguel, which he had till then governed, in the hands of the said Abbot of Paisley. Being then asked by the latter as to the reason of the said resignation, the said Roger replied that, being oppressed with age and weakness, he was so constantly troubled with bodily infirmity as to be unable to rule the flock committed to him by God, and their lands and possessions, and other temporal goods, to their profit, as behoved the office of a good shepherd; and that he desired rather to be entirely stripped of the honour of the prelacy, than under the name of a shepherd to expose his desolate flock to be devoured by the ravening wolf. Which causes, so set forth by him, having been judged reasonable by the said Abbot John and his council, he received the resignation thus freely made in his hands, and then altogether absolved the said Roger from the office of Abbot of Crosraguel; commanding the monks to fix among themselves a day for the election of their future pastor,¹ lest the church, through the want of a shepherd, should suffer loss in things spiritual and temporal.

ABSTRACT.

Charter by Malcolm son of Roland of Carrick,¹ to John Kennedy,² lord of Dunure, for his counsel and aid, of those two pennyworths of land which are called Treuchane and Kenethane, lying within the parish of Kirkmichael Munterduffy,³ in the earldom of Carrick and shire of Ayr; of which lands

² The grant of the Kenkynol was confirmed to John Kennedy by King Robert II. in 1372 (Culzean Muniments).

the whole right and claim which Murdac son of Sowerl had, he resigned and surrendered by staff and baton, to the said Malcolm before many faithful witnesses: To hold to the said John and his heirs, of the granter and his heirs, in fee and heritage, for the yearly rent of a pair of white spurs, in name of blench ferme, at the feast of St. Michael the Archangel, at Kirkmichael Munterduffy. Sealed before these witnesses, John Stewart, Earl of Carrick,¹ Sir Nicolas Abbot of Crosraguel, Gilbert Kennedy,² John son of Henry, John son of Alexander, Adam son of Thomas, and many others.

this charter will hardly enhance his reputation for thrift (v. Robertson's Index, p. 134; Pater-son's Lands and their Owners in Galloway, p. 24; Chalmers, iii. 380).

ABSTRACT.

Indenture between the right noble men, Thomas Flemyng, grandson and heir of the deceased Sir Malcolm Flemyng, Earl of Wigton, on one part, and John Kennedy, Lord of Dunure, on the other part, to the effect that the said Thomas Flemyng, of his mere free will and for his further advantage, granted in wadset to his beloved and special friend the said John Kennedy, all his lands of Cumbernald in the barony of Lenzie, within the shire of Dumbarton, for one hundred and twenty merks of good money, in gold and silver, paid in hand to the said Thomas: To hold to the said John and his heirs until the said Thomas Flemyng, or the heirs of his body, lawfully gotten or to be gotten, shall pay to the said John Kennedy or his heirs one hundred and twenty merks of good money, of gold and silver, at the feast of St. Martin in winter, at Dunure, for deliverance of the said lands of Cumbernald to the proper use of the said Thomas or his heirs; and that the said Thomas, for himself and his heirs, granted and gave to the said John, for his counsel and good deeds done and to be done to him and his, all the fermes, rents, and advantages arising from the said lands, during the time of the wadset. It was also agreed that neither the said Thomas nor his heirs should wadset, sell, or deliver the foresaid lands into the hands, or for the use of any other persons or person, except only to himself or his heirs; nor should the said John Kennedy or his heirs sell the wadset of the said lands to any one for the sake of specialty or advantage; but that the said Thomas or his heirs should deliver the lands by the aforesaid payment; which being made to the aforesaid John Kennedy or his heirs, by the said Thomas or his heirs, they should then have the lands again freely from the said John Kennedy and his heirs. Sealed by the said parties interchangeably, at Ayr, on Friday the 16th of February 1374-5, before these witnesses, the reverend father Sir Nicholas Abbot of Crosraguel;¹ a prudent man, John Mure, prebendary of the Church of Ayr; Sir Nicholas of Knockdolian,² and Sir Gilbert Kennedy,³ knights; John son of the deceased Henry, Adam son of the deceased Thomas of Carrick, John of Montagu, John of Moray, burgesses of Ayr, and many others.

of Knockdolian Hill.

³ Son of John Kennedy of Dunure. He had also a charter from Thomas Fleming of the town of Kirkintilloch in 1370 (Culzean Charters).

be received from the provost of the chapel, as aforewritten ; with one mercate of the lands of Kynach ; and so to their successors in their order : Also granting one mercate of the lands of Kynach, next to the said chapel, for the maintenance of one clerk for the provision of the chapel, the provost, and the others therein instituted : He further ordains that all presbyters to be founded in the chapel, as well as those already founded, shall obey the provost in things lawful and honest ; and that all the presbyters, whether they have other benefices or not, shall make continuous residence, unless a reasonable cause shall intervene, and they be excused by permission of the provost ; also that they shall celebrate daily, when disposed thereto ; and if any one fails to celebrate mass, unless upon reasonable cause, or the allowance of the provost, he shall be amerced in four pence for each default ; the money to be disposed by the provost for the support of the chapel : Further, that they shall be present in the chapel during all canonical hours, as well on Lord's days as on double or festival days ; and whoever shall on such days be absent from vespers, matins, high mass, or second vespers, shall be amerced in four pence for each occasion of absence : and if any one shall be absent from the first, third, sixth, ninth complines, he shall be amerced in one penny for each fault ; a similar penalty being incurred from absence from high mass on festival days ; ordaining also that these fines shall be fully paid at the end of each month, to be disposed of by the provost between himself and those presbyters who served well : The granter further ordains that the aforesaid lands of Athylenne and Ardowrag shall be as free in all respects as the other lands of the said chapel, as in his charters concerning the foundation thereof was more amply contained. The presbyters are further ordained to swear bodily to observe all and sundry the rules above mentioned : and so long as any of them violate their oath, and refuse to give obedience to the provost of the said chapel, the fruits of their benefices shall wholly belong to the provost : In witness whereof, the seal of the granter, together with that of Sir Gilbert Kennedy his son and heir, are appended at Cassillis, 1st March 1383-4 : The witnesses being Walter Bishop of Glasgow, John Bishop of Dunkeld, Nicholas Abbot of Crosraguel, John Abbot of Kilwinning, John Henryson Lord of Culyagan, Thomas Kennedy Lord of Geyltrew, Sir William Woodcok, presbyter, and many others.

⁵ Or Dailly, v. note on No. 2. The patronage of these five churches rested with Crosraguel until 1617, when they were annexed to the Bishopric of Dunblane (v. Nos. 133 and 135 infra).

⁶ In the parish of Barr, on the Stinchar; called at various times Kildimine, Kildamnie, and Kirkdamdie. The ruins of the chapel still exist, but the date of its erection is unknown. The celebrated "Kirkdamdie Fair" has from time immemorial been held at this place on the last Saturday of May, but is now little more than a gathering of farmers in the neighbourhood.

¹ Chapel-Donan, on the lands of Craigoch, near the coast, about two miles N.N.E. of Girvan. St. Donan was a Scottish saint of the ninth century (Chalmers, iii. 539), and his feast was celebrated on April 9. Cf. Kildonan.

³ Near the Girvan, one mile north-east of Dalquharran.

⁴ i.e. Ailsa Craig. There is an old castle on the Craig of an early date, which may or may not have belonged to the abbey. The Rev. Mr. Lawson, in his little work on Crosraguel, mentions that the Hamilton arms are carved on one of the walls, which would indicate that the castle was built by one of the Hamilton family in Arran. There is no evidence of a Hamilton having been abbot of Crosraguel, nor is it likely that he would have cut his own bearings on an abbatial edifice. Ailsa was, and is, in Dailly parish, from being part of the barony of Knockgarron, which was itself in the regality of Crosraguel (see note on No. 29). In 1597 a daring Catholic baron, Barclay of Ladyland, seized and fortified Ailsa with intention of delivering it to the Spaniards; but he was driven into the sea by Mr. Andro Knox, minister of Paisley. He could not have had time to build the castle, as has been suggested, and it is, moreover, of much more ancient date (v. Spottiswood, p. 445; MS. State Paper Office, quoted by Tytler, iii. 309). The Marquis of Ailsa holds the Craig to this day by paying a lordship of solan geese to be laid down at the door of Fairlie House every year (Paterson, p. 246).

papers at the end of the volume it is evident that ten was the complete establishment of the monastery (v. Nos. 64, 65, 68, etc., infra).

Charter by John M'Gillelane, son and heir of the deceased Ingram M'Gillelane, lord of the half of the Over Barony of Glenstyncher, commonly called Dalcarne, in favour of his very dear friend Fergus Kennedy, lord of Bonumyne, for his valuable counsel and help oftentimes given to the said John, and for the sum of forty pounds of good and usual money of gold and silver, of the kingdom of Scotland, fully paid to him in his great and urgent necessity, of all and whole the lands of the half of the Over Barony of Glenstyncher, in the earldom of Carrick and shire of Ayr: To hold of the Lord Earl of Carrick in fee and heritage for ever; doing therefor, the said Fergus and his heirs, the services due and wont. 25. The Abbot of Crosraguel Ambassador to Ireland.—A.D. 1429.²

A parliament haldin at Perth the 6 of Marehe this zeire. This zeire, Odo prince of Conaghte in Irlande sends Donald Balloches head to the King with his awin ambassador the Abbot of Corsreguall.³

² Sir James Balfour's Annals of Scotland, vol. i. p. 159.

³ Balfour is our sole authority for this. We know that on the flight of Donald Balloch to Ireland in 1429, Odo Prince of Connaught by secret treaty with James I., sent him the rebel chieftain's head. We may presume from this that the Abbot of Crosraguel was sent over on this mission. But Balfour is proverbially inaccurate (Acts of the Parliament of Scotland, ii. 20; Buchanan's Hist., x. chaps. xxxiii.-iv.)

ABSTRACT.

Notarial Instrument narrating that Robert Bishop of Glasgow compeared personally in presence of notaries public and other witnesses, in the chapter of the church of Glasgow, and openly declared that, on account of the hearty friendship, charity, and affection which animated him, he was content that George Abbot of Paisley and the convent of the same place, of the Cluniae order and diocese of Glasgow, and also Colin Abbot of Crosraguel, with his cell of the same diocese, pertaining to the said abbot and convent, and their monasteries and places, with their freedoms, immunities and privileges, should remain in all time coming, wholly and peaceably, as they remained in the time of Andrew formerly Bishop of Glasgow, and in the earlier times of his other predecessors, in regard to the payment of charitable subsidy, visitation, and exaction of the procurations, and other impetrations whatsoever, and should enjoy their privileges, immunities and freedoms, notwithstanding the apostolic bulls and processes fulminated thereon, and others held by the said bishop to the contrary, and impetrated by him in the court of Rome : which impetrations, bulls, and processes, in so far as they might seem in any way to touch the aforesaid Abbot of Paisley and his convent, and the Abbot of Crosraguel and his cell, their successors, places and monasteries, or the privileges of the Cluniae order, and the government thereof, the said reverend father, bishop of Glasgow, of his mere liberality, and for the good of peace and concord, expressly and willingly renounced : protesting, however, that the said bulls and impetrations, as to others, should remain whole and sound, and in proper force : whereupon, the said George Abbot of Paisley for himself and convent, and for the said Colin Abbot of Crosraguel and his cell, craved instruments from the notaries public, viz., Mr. John Goldsmith, John Reston, and John of Thornton : These things were done in the place aforesaid, at eleven o'clock before noon, on 24 September 1487, in presence of these witnesses, Mr. John Crichton, precentor, Mr. Martin Wann, chancellor, Gilbert Rerik, archdean, Patrick Leyth, canon and official of Glasgow, and Richard Gibson, notary.

TRANSLATION.

Colin abbot of Crosraguel, having set his heart on the restoration of his church, which had now been long in ruins from the fury of savage enemies, and was almost completely overturned, caused huge blocks of stone to be brought thither, and to be united for the repair of the sanctuary by strengthening the walls in an admirable style. And that no accuracy of detail should be wanting in the completion of the edifice he spent whole days amongst the masons and the other artisans.

ABSTRACT.

Notarial Instrument narrating that a circumspect clerk, Mr. David Cunyngham, rural dean of the deanery of the christianity of Ruglen, riding upon visitation of the said deanery, and coming to the monastery of Paisley, of the diocese of Glasgow, went personally to the gate of the said monastery and demanded admission, and that himself and the servants there present with him should be received in the said monastery: and that in the meantime there compeared a discreet and religious man, Sir John Mouss, then chamberlain of the said monastery, sent by a venerable man, George abbot thereof, and asserted that the said abbot and convent would not receive the dean by way of visitation or of right, because they were exempted from all visitation of whatsoever ordinaries, and also their churches and places wherever constituted, as was clearly evident to every one who looked at the exemptions and privileges granted to them by several chief pontiffs : and so the said dean, seeing that he could not be received in the said monastery by reason of visitation, was content to be received therein by the favour of the abbot and convent : upon all which the said Sir John Mouss craved instruments of Alexander Clugston, notary. These things were done at the gate of the monastery, at three o'clock afternoon, on 31st January 1489-90, in presence of Sir Robert Whytefurd, monk, and then cellarer of the said monastery, Mr. Henry Newton, Sir Cuthbert Mulykyn, and John Makquhen, laymen, with many other witnesses, specially called to the premises.

¹ Most probably the Robert de Quintfort or Whitefoord who was elected Abbot of Crosraguel in 1491 (see No. 32 infra). The "cellarer" had more to do than his name implies. He was usually accountant and cashier as well (v. Dr. Lees' Paisley Abbey, p. 11; Monasticon, p.

13; C. Innes' Scotch Legal Antiquities, p. 170; and compare Nisbet's Heraldry, i. p. 235). "The oldest branch of this family [Whitefoord] is Whitefoord of Blairquhan, who took up his residence with his brother, who was Abbot of Crosraguel in the reign of King James IV."

ABSTRACT.

Notarial Instrument upon the resignation by Duncan Fergusson of Knokgarron, by staff and baton in the hands of the venerable Colin Abbot of Crosraguel, and convent of the monastery thereof, with due reverence, of his forty shilling lands of Knokgarron and Altyeaple, lying in the earldom of Carriek and shire of Ayr: So that it should be lawful to the said abbot and convent, after the resignation, to dispose freely of the said lands, and especially in favour of John Fergusson, son and apparent heir of the said Duncan, if they should please to bestow the said lands upon him. Done in the chapter-house of the said monastery, about noon, on the 27th day of August 1490, before these witnesses: John Fergusson, brother of the said Duncan, Duncan Kirkpatrick, John Fergusson son of the resigner, Sir Thomas M'Ihauch, vicar of Girvan, and John Wishart, son and apparent heir of Adam Wishart, burgess of Ayr. Andrew McCormyl is notary.

see with power of legatus de latere, specially appointed by the most sacred lord the Pope and his apostolic see to the king and kingdom of Scotland, and explained that a special faculty had been granted to him by the said Pope to visit all monasteries as well exempt as not exempt, and to chastise the excesses and enormities of the friars dwelling therein within the foresaid kingdom; and that, on the 25th of January last bypast, in the town of Leith, he promised to exonerate, and in reality exonerated, from the foresaid faculty Robert, Abbot of the monastery of Paisley, the said monastery, monks, and their servitors and familiar servants, and the monastery of Corsraguell depending on the said monastery of Paisley, and the religious men dwelling there, and the churches pertaining and subject to the said monasteries; and before the notary and witnesses the said most reverend father in Christ ratified and confirmed the said permission and exoneration, and of his certain knowledge, mere motion, and for the singular favour which he bore towards the foresaid venerable father in Christ, and for many other good deeds done to him in manifold wise, exonerated and quitclaimed the said venerable father, monasteries and monks, their servitors and familiars, and the churches of Paisley and Corsraguel, from the foresaid faculty by the tenor of the present instrument; and bound himself by oath never to come in the contrary hereof, and never to visit or reform the said monastery of Corsraguel, monks, familiars, and servitors of the same, or churches subject to the said monasteries, or seek or exact procurations or subsidy by reason of visitation, or for any other way, title, or cause, from them or any of them, by himself, commissioners, delegates, or any other intermediate person, or to use the privileges granted to him in any way in the premises without obtaining the express consent of the said Abbot. ³ Probably either owing to his youth, or to a fear of the control of the monastery passing from their hands into those of the House of Cassillis. A few years after this the monks of Paisley were gravely scandalised by the appointment of John Hamilton, then a mere stripling, to their own abbacy (Reg. de Passelet, and Dr. Lees' Paisley, p. 185).

ABSTRACT.

Signature by King James V. to William, abbot of Crosraguel, and Sir John Kennedy, prebendary of Maybole, of the gift of the ward of the £10 land of Row, with the mill thereof, lying in the bailiary of Carrick, and that so long as the same shall fall in his Grace's hands by reason of ward, by and through the decease of Giles [Egidia] Blair, conjunct fiar thereof, with all mails, fermes, profits, and duties of the same during the said ward, and until the entry of the righteous heir thereto being of lawful age, with the relief thereof when it shall happen. 12th April 1530.

55. *Copy of the Deed of Settlement of Egidia Blair, Lady Row, who lived in Carrick, in the County of Air, executed on the 31st August 1530.*¹

Seeing nothing is more certain than death, or more uncertain than the hour of death, therefore it is, that I Egidia Blair,² Lady Row, although weak in body yet sound in mind, blessed be God, make my testament as follows: In the first place, I give and bequeath my soul to God Almighty, and the blessed Virgin Mary, and to all saints, and my body to be buried in the monastery of Crossraguel, in the blessed Virgin's aisle.³ I likewise bequeath and Lord of Row (v. No. 54 supra), son of Gilbert first Lord Kennedy.

ABSTRACT.

Gift by Quintin Abbot of Crosraguel and convent thereof to Gilbert Earl of Cassillis of the nonentries of the forty shilling land of Knockgarron and twenty shilling land of Alticapel, lying in the earldom of Carrick, then in the hands of the abbot and convent as superiors thereof, by the decease of John Fergusson of Knockgarron, last immediate tenant of the same, with the mails, fermes, profits, and duties thereof, of all years bygone and to come during the said nonentry, and until the entry of the righteous heir thereto : reserving to the abbot and convent and their successors the sum of twenty shillings money of Scotland, to be uplifted and paid from the said lands as the yearly feu-duty thereof.—19th May 1548.

¹ Kilhenzie Castle lies on a rising ground south of Maybole, and the picturesque ruins are still visible. It was granted to one Thomas Kennedy in 1429 with its lands, which were acquired about 1500 by the Bairds. They held it until 1620, when it again passed into the hands of the Kennedies.

¹ The Will of Gavin Dunbar, Archbishop of Glasgow (MS. in possession of Sir William Dunbar of Mochrum).

² Gavin Dunbar, son of Sir John Dunbar of Mochrum, Bishop of Glasgow 1524-47, formerly Prior of Whithorn; Lord of the Regency and Commendator of Inchaffray in 1536. He was buried in the chancel of his cathedral, where his remains were found in 1855 in a stone sarcophagus. There were some rich vestments found with the skeleton, which testify to the excellence of his lordship's wardrobe (v. Reg. Epis. Glas., B. 25, No. 99, et passim). George Buchanan has written some eulogistic lines on this Archbishop (v. Gordon's Scotichronicon, ii. 521).

having been the depositary of the Archbishop's utensilia et domicilia, to the value of £338 : 8s., and money to the value of £2410. Abbot William probably died in the winter of 1547-8, as he was present in Parliament on 18th March 1546-7; and on 2d February 1547-8 we have Abbot Quintin's discharge to the Earl of Cassillis for the furniture, plate, etc., belonging to William late Abbot of Crosraguel (No. 63 supra). The Archbishop died in April 1547 (Reg. Epis. Glasguensis), and William must therefore have lived long enough after that to have taken possession of the plate, etc., and money, and to have transferred it to the Earl of Cassillis and the Rector of Stobo. Why the Archbishop chose his friend the Abbot of Crosraguel as the depositary of his property does not appear. He probably thought that it would be safer in the quiet retreat of Crosraguel, and under the powerful protection of the Earl of Cassillis, than amid the turbulence of the city of Glasgow.

² By the charter of 1404 (ante) the Abbots of Crosraguel had a right of regality over their lands cum quatuor punctis coronæ, robbery being one of these "points of the crown."

fermline (Arnot's Edinburgh, p. 84; Innes' Antiquities, p. 165; Chart. Newbottle, No. 73; Chart. Cambuskenneth, p. 30). Mr. Cochran-Patrick (Records of Mining in Scotland, p. 1) quotes an even earlier charter in 1210 by the Earl of Winton of the coalheughs between Pinkie and Inveresk.

74. The three days' disputation between Quintin Abbot of Crosraguel and John Knox, on Maybole Green.—[28th September 1562.]¹

Quintinus Kennedius prælatus Catholicus.

Sectarii cum viderent Catholicos a diversis partibus diversos catholicæ religionis defensionem suseepisse viam tanto periculo ocludendam primo quoque tempore statuunt.

¹ De rebus gestis Scotorum, Leslæus, p. 540. For the following account of this famous "Disputation" I am chiefly indebted to the account written by John Knox, and to Paterson's Ayrshire, vol. ii. p. 26.

The origin of the well-known discussion which took place at Maybole between the Abbot of Crosraguel and John Knox may be thus briefly stated. In 1559 the Abbot had challenged Willock, who happened to preach in the neighbourhood of Crosraguel, to a disputation concerning the mass. The gauntlet was duly taken up, and the place of meeting appointed, but the discussion was broken off in consequence of certain preliminary disagreements. The mass now became the chief study of Kennedy, and in 1561 he published a work in its defence. In the course of the following year he stated in his chapel of Kirkoswald—after reading a series of papers concerning the mass and other essential tenets connected with the doctrines of the Popish Church—his readiness to defend them against all by whom they might be impugned, but promised on the following Sabbath to declare himself more fully on the subject. Knox, being in the vicinity, came to Kirkoswald to hear the Abbot; and in the morning acquainted him of his intention to do so, requiring him at the same time either to make good his promise or allow him (Knox) to preach first, and afterwards state his objections to what might be advanced. The Abbot, aware of the excitement of the times, and the danger to be dreaded from a public display of this kind, did not appear, and Knox occupied the pulpit. On coming down, however, a letter was put into his hands dated 6th September, in which Kennedy expressed himself as most anxious to engage in a discussion with him.

The terms proposed by the Abbot were perfectly reasonable. He wished in the excited state of the public mind to avoid all risk of disturbance. Knox, on the contrary, confident of success, was anxious that the discussion should take place in open assembly, and that his triumph should be witnessed by thousands.

Kennedy replied to his somewhat intemperately expressed letter in a mild but forcible manner. In reference to Knox's statement that he came not for disputation but to preach Jesus Christ crucified, the Abbot observes, "Praise be to God, that was na newings in this countrie or ze war borne." Secondly, he remarks, "He is ane euill iudge that condemns or he knawes," and that it would have been time enough to have called the articles in question blasphemous when he had seen, read, and sufficiently confuted them. Thirdly, that he promised to make declaration of the said articles on Sunday last, provided there had been no convocation of strangers, wherethrough disturbance might ensue; but Knox came accompanied by five or six score of followers. "Quhair ze say," remarks the Abbot, "ze stand in the protection of the Ahnrichtie, swa dois all gude Christiane men as ze, bot appearantie ze put als lytil in God's handis as ze may, that gois accompanied in enerie place quhairsumeuer ze go with sic multitude, quhiddir it be for devotion, or protection, or rather tumultuation, God knawes, for I knaw not. . . . Quhair ze say I haif infected the earis of the simple, I have wounded the hartes of the godlie, and I have spoken blasphemie in open audience, I mernell how ze forget zoursell, chidand and railland in this maner. The Abbot declined holding the discussion in St. John's Church in Ayr, because he wished to avoid tumult, and as for the "iust tryall of the treuth thair man be conference of mony buikes," he thought that could not be conveniently discussed in open audience. After some further correspondence between Knox, the Abbot, and the Earl of Cassillis, the disputation was at length agreed to upon nearly the same terms as at first proposed by Kennedy. The correspondence is interesting, as showing the movements of the parties. Knox was at Kirkoswald on Sabbath the 8th September, where he preached; upon which occasion he received the letter of the Abbot challenging him to a disputation. Knox, according to his own statement, lay at Maybole the night before with a company not surpassing twenty. On the same day he replies to the letter of the Abbot from Ayr. Between that and the 25th of September, when he writes to the Earl of Cassillis from Ochiltree, he appears to have been away in Dumfriesshire and Galloway. On the 27th of September the parties met at Maybole, when the following agreement was signed:—

"The day, houre, condicione, and number agreed vpon, for the conference betuix Maister Quinteyne Kennedy, Abbot of Crosraguel, and John Knox, minister at Edinburgh.

"The day is the xxviii of September, 1562. The place the Prouestis place of Mayboill, the houre to conuene is at eight houres before none, the day foirsaid, the number for euerie part shall be fourtie persones, by there scribes and learned men, with so many mo as the house may goodly hold, be the sight of my Lord of Cas-illis. And heirupon, bothe the said Abbote and John Knox are whollylie and fullylie agreed. In witness whereof they have subscribed these presents with their hands. At Mayboill, the xxviii of September, 1562.

CROSRAGUEL.

"JOHN KNOX."

The conference took place accordingly in the "place" of Andrew Gray, the last provost of the Collegiate, in the back vennel of Maybole. A huge concourse of people from all quarters was drawn to the scene of debate, and Maybole was densely crowded. The only account of the discussion which has been preserved was drawn up by Knox himself and printed in 1563 in black letter; and the only copy known to exist is preserved in the Auchinleck Library. A facsimile edition was thrown off in 1812, and those who wish to pursue the subject can find a copy of the discussion in the Woodrow Society's publications. The conference, commencing each morning, was carried on for three days. The Abbot grounded his argument upon the Apostle St. Paul, who "affirms our Saviour to be an priest for ever according to the ordure of Melchisedec;" and the main point for dispute was whether Melchisedec actually brought forth the bread and wine as a sacrifice, or not. The conference was somewhat abruptly brought to a close, and Knox himself thus records the cause of its conclusion: "This conference being ended for the tyme, my Lorde presentlie did rise for trouble of body, and then John Knox did shortly resume the principall grounds. And because the noble men heir assembled were altogether destitute of all prouision bothe for horse and man, the said Johne humblie requireth the foirsaid Lord that it would please him to go to Air, whair that better easiment might be had for all estates, which because my Lord vterlie refused, the said John desired that the said conference should be ended. My Lorde did promise upon license purchased of the Quene's maiestie and her honorable counsall, that he would compear in Edinburgh, and there in their presence finish the said conference. The said John did promes

The following paper was put in, signed by the Abbot:—"At the conclusion of our ressoning, I gaif John Knox ane argument in writ, desiring him that he wald iustifie his opinion be expres testimonie of Scripture, or ony appearance thereof. Qubairto the said John required tyme to give answer, and the tyme nicht nawise serue of farder ressoning, for sic causes as are comprehended in the said John Knox writing. In the written reply to the Abbot's reasoning, which is given in the printed account of the discussion, Knox claims the palm, though he speaks at the same time of the "common bruit that Kennedy, his flatterers and collattoralles brag greatly of their victorie." At the breaking-up of the conference it is said, perhaps erroneously, that the books brought for reference by the Abbot, amounting to several wain loads, were seized by the mob, and consigned to the flames on the green of Maybole, in celebration of the assumed triumph of Knox.

ABSTRACT.

Apostolic letters by John, Archbishop of St. Andrews, primate of Scotland, legatus natus, Abbot of Paisley, with power of a legate a latere from the Apostolic see, and nuncio from the same to Mary Queen of Scots, to Alan Stewart, master of arts, descendant of a noble family, providing him to the Abbacy of Crosraguel, dependent upon the Abbacy of Paisley, then vacant by the decease of Mr. Quintin Kennedy in July 1564, and that in compliance with the request and on the presentation of King Henry and Queen Mary. The appointment is made with consent of the Chapter of Paisley and in virtue of the Archbishop's powers as legate and legate a latere, in consequence of the injury that might arise to the Abbey through a long vacancy, being at so great a distance from the court of Rome. With right to the fruits, rents, and emoluments of the abbey, and keeping the ceremonies used and wont, on the admission of intrants and novices.¹ Dated at the monastery of Paisley, 26th September 1565.

¹ The rule of admission is an admirable instance of the severity of the Benedictine code or rule. "For four days to stand at the gate and entreat the porter, who is to repel his advances in the severest manner. If he perseveres and obtains an entrance, he is to be led into a chamber appointed for strangers, there to be attended by the most ancient men in the monastery, who would acquaint him with the severest rules, and then with the remainder if he remains firm. He is then made a novice, and is again examined in six months, and again in four months. If he then passes, he is numbered among the brethren."

¹ The subprior and other monks had probably fled when deprived of their abbot, as we know that they afterwards returned (v. Nos. 113, 117, etc.) Sir John Mure was at this time subprior (v. No. 69 ante), whom Dempster and Father Hay describe as "vir doctissimus, qui multa scripsit et obiit 1585." The subprior appears to have been always second in rank at Crosraguel, as there is no mention of a prior, as at Paisley.

ABSTRACT.

Instrument of institution of Mr. Alan Stewart, perpetual commendator of the monastery of Crosraguel, in the abbacy thereof—bearing that he appeared at the monastery holding in his hands letters patent of Mary Queen of Scots, bearing a gift and donation to him of the foresaid monastery, dated at Edinburgh the 19th of July 1565: and also letters of provision made thereupon by John, archbishop of St. Andrews, primate of Scotland legate nate, and with power of legate a latere and nuncio of the apostolic see to the foresaid Queen Mary, of date at the monastery of Paisley 6 Kalendas Octobris 1565; where he made diligent inquiry for the subprior and convent, but found none present save one religious man, Sir Michael Dewar, whom he asked to show him the entrance to the church of the monastery and the stall or principal seat of the Lord Abbot thereof, who inducted and placed him therein: and having received and read the foresaid letters, inducted and instituted the said Alan Steward into real and corporal possession of the foresaid monastery of Crosraguel, rights, annexes, fruits, provents, and pertinents thereof; and thereafter passed and instituted him in the same way in the chapter-house, hall, tower or fortalice thereof. After which the abbot deputed certain servants for preservation of the same in his name, and left them to be answerable to him thereupon. Done in the said monastery of Crosraguel 16th December 1565.

ABSTRACT.

Contract between Mr. Allan Stewart Abbot of Crosraguel and James Stewart of Cardonald, bearing our sovereign Lady the Queen having by her gift, for the true and thankful service done to her Grace by the said James Stewart, granted to Mr. Allan Stewart the Abbacy of Crosraguel, vacant by the decease of Mr. Quintin Kennedy late abbot thereof, and because Gilbert Earl of Cassillis had a Letter of Assedation of the abbacy from Mr. Quintin Kennedy for the space of five years from Whitsunday 1564, for payment only of 700 merks yearly, and the said sum being small and some years of the Assedation to run, Mr. Allan Stewart for good causes sets to the said James Stewart and his heirs the abbacy with the fruits, rents, profits, duties, and emoluments, both spiritual and temporal, belonging thereto, for all the days of his (Mr. Allan Stewart's) life, and that immediately following the date of the contract, with power to the said James to uptake and receive all the rents, duties, and emoluments belonging to the abbacy; and also promises to set in feu-farm to him the temporal lands of the abbey, and to lease the teinds and duties of the abbey to him for 19 years, for payment of 2s. 4d. for the boll of victual, 2s. 8d. for the boll of oats, and 16 pence for the stone of cheese. Reserving to the abbot a pension of £100, to be yearly uptaken from the churches of Straiton and Kirkcudbright. Dated 29th December 1565.
